From W. W. Morrow's talk to an associated press correspondent, there remains no doubt of his candidacy for Governor. When he is in the hands of his friends, that means: "I am in for it with a will." Congressman Morrow is a live man and exceedingly popular. In his interview he calls attention to the necessity of having a Republican Legislature. The last Legislature was Democratic and extravagant to the last degree. In this interview Mr. Morrow gives opinions on some public matters as follows: "The silver bill, as agreed upon by the Committee of Conference and adopted by the Senate to-day, was very satisfactory to him. It was a good bill. It was identical with the compromise measure which was at one time agreed upon by the Republican caucus, and if matters had transpired according to his wish, the bill would have been a law by this time. The tariff bill will pass the Senate, and that then a conference of the California delegation would be able to secure the restoration of the provisions in relation to sweet wines. The Republican party is friendly to the productive interests of our coast, as well as to all sections of the country. The sugar schedule will probably remain as it is, although I think the revenues required for paying pensions and other increased expenses of the Government would require the retention of a portion of the present sugar duties until such time as we might secure by proper treaties a fair return for whatever reduction we make in our duties. In other words, I would give some attention to Blaine's policy of extending our trade and commerce to other countries."

There are three great and important measures pending before Congress—the tariff, the silver question, and the proposed system of election supervision by the Federal Government. The tariff is virtually settled. The silver bill is under revision and will probably result in adopting the one agreed upon in the conference. The Federal election measure meets with the solid and persistent opposition of the Democracy. It is difficult to see why the measures that have for 20 years been adopted in large cities, of Federal interference and protection, should not become general. At the present time, in all large cities, there are United States officers sworn to supervise the elections, where national officers are to be elected. It is ridiculous to speak of the measure as a force bill; there is no force about it. It only provides for a Federal supervision of Federal elections. The conduct of elections will remain as now, in State hands, the duty of the supervisors being to see and report whether or not there has been a free election and a fair count. At present all control and oversight of the election and the counting and return of the votes is, in most of the Southern States, in the hands of the Democrats exclusively.

The National Government should do what it can to break up that one-sided arrangement in Congressional elections, if in no other, and that is all the pending bill proposes to do.

The State Library Trustees have, after a length of time in incubation, formulated a set of rules, so called, that for ponderosity in conception and tyrannical in intent, can only be equalled by an ukase of the Russian czar. The suggested articles of this close corporation, purporting to emanate from so intelligent a man, so profound a scholar, so true a friend of the people, and such an advocate of the spread of information among the people as Library Trustee Green, of Colusa county, broke upon the public last Monday, when one of the daily papers announced the proclamation. Heretofore the Library has been pretty well run by men who had some intelligence, and who made necessary regulations for the government of that institution and its officers, but always within the law, and with an humble consciousness that they were not superior to the legislative requirement as laid down in the Political Code. And although librarians have, at times, not come up to the expectations of the people or to the requirements of the place, yet they have always been willing to recognize the supremacy of a higher law—the Legislature of the State. Nor have State Library Trustees of other years presumed to employ a greater number of subordinates in the Library than are actually allowed by the statute. Section 2295, Subdivision 2, makes it the duty of the Librarian "to act as Secretary of the Board of Trustees, and keep a record of their proceedings." And yet, the present Board, in full disregard of this requirement, has made the Deputy Librarian its Secretary. Another section of the Code says that State officers shall be allowed to take books from the Library, besides members of the Legislature when that body is in session. And this privilege has heretofore been construed by old-fashioned Trustees to include the families, and sometimes chosen friends of the State officers; and in no instance has it been reported that a book or periodical has been lost or damaged because of this courteous kindness. Yet, the new dispensation, as if specially aiming and directing its regulation at some particular State officer because of either hatred or a desire to insult, enact that "any State officer may take from the Library to their respective offices such books as they may require for reference in the discharge of their official duties, but not for the use of another person who has not the legal privilege of taking books." Can the intelligent gentlemen say how many of the State officers, aside from the Attorney General, require books for reference in the discharge of their duties? And why talk of "the legal privilege," when that privilege allowed them already by the Code is annulled by the Board? Or does the Board mean by "legal privilege," that privilege made by themselves, and which entirely ignores the Code? Rule 3 provides that when anyone visits the Library and wants a book or paper, and it happens to be out at the time "in the hands of a State officer, or other person under the statute law or these rules, the Librarian shall have it returned, if practicable, for the use of such person." Thus, again, it is evident to see a fling is aimed at a State officer or officers; for the term, "if practicable," can only mean if the book or paper is held by some one away from the building it would not be "practicable" to send after it, but if a State officer should have it, how "practicable to send to that officer and get it. Sureley, the public will have to find solution for this wonderful "new constitution" of the State Library in petty spite felt for some offending State officer.

The new Board went into office with that flourish of the new broom that promised immense popularity; the Library was to be kept open till nine o'clock at night; all day Sunday the public were to have the benefit of the books; the meek and lowly were to be accorded every privilege and facility till the State echoed the praises of those who inaugurated those desired changes. But it was but the preparation preceding the enactment of a set of selfish regulations and requirements that will make men shun the place because they will feel as if their presence were contaminating, and as if they were poachers encroaching on private grounds, sacredly consecrated to the Trustees and their chosen subordinates.

If we did not feel that our proffered aid would be indignantly rejected, we would suggest some additional rules to those proposed. For example, it might be provided: When a visitor calls he shall first knock and await the coming of the bell-boy, who will take in the visitor's card. No one unable to write will be allowed to enter. If he has a quid of tobacco in his mouth, he will deposit that in his vest pocket till he retires, or give it to the call-boy who will take care of it till called for. Ladies will leave their gum outside on the window sill. No one will be permitted to sneeze during his stay in the Library. A violation of this rule will be punished by banishment from the realm. Lawyers are expected to handle no books they do not peruse when actually reading the same. No visitor will, under any consideration, be permitted to read more than one book at a time, and that only in the English language, so that the attendant may know what is being read. No political "skulduggery" will be tolerated on the part of visitors, as that is a prerogative reserved solely for the owners of the Library. The powers that be are the sole judges of what is proper and perfect etiquette, and therefore will give no reason for the immediate expulsion of improper characters from the premises. Slight flirtations in the alcoves will be allowed at reasonable and limited times, after permission is first obtained. Ladies and children bringing their lunches will be required to divide with the officials of the Library—especially when they bring a supply of taffy. The foregoing rules and requirements are in an especial manner intended for the guidance of the State officers, the statute of the State of California, in this instance made and provided to the contrary, notwithstanding.

BRODERICK AND GWIN.

An Interesting Retrospect of a Noted Senatorial Contest—How Broderick was Tricked—Protests of His Friends.

CONCLUSION.

The politics of this State at the time of which we write (1857), were in a transition state. The slavery question had been studiously kept out of sight by the leaders. The Democratic party had from the first, among its rank and file, divided largely on that issue. But the leaders denied that such an issue existed, and many of the supporters of Gwin were anti-slavery, whilst Broderick reckoned amongst his staunchest supporters men of southern birth, but not fanatic on the slavery question. The time was rapidly approaching when that line should be clearly marked. But neither Broderick nor Gwin recognized it as near. Both disclaimed that such an issue existed, and probably both believed honestly that the highest statesmanship required that the institution of slavery should not be attacked, but should be allowed to exist under the Constitution. We now know that each was wrong. That freedom and slavery could not both exist in the same government and each be permanent. That there is such direct antagonism between the two principles that sooner or later one must go to the wall and the other become dominant. Two years later Broderick recognized this and took his true position. But when he consented that Gwin should be his colleague in the United States Senate, he at least hoped to postpone the day when these two forces should meet in battle array, and he yielded to a division of the honors.

We now invite attention to the letter from Gwin to Broderick, published in our last issue. The letter itself would indicate that its contents were the spontaneous expressions of a patriot inviting concert of action for the public good. Bear in mind the fact that Broderick and Gwin had been for six years political opponents, and that the opposition to Broderick had assumed at times a bitter personal character. Gwin calls Broderick's attention to the fact that he is likely to be the victim of unparalleled treachery of his friends, on whom he had conferred federal patronage. That the power he had exercised as Senator in the past in securing federal patronage to friends, had been a source of evil and destruction of his peace of mind, and he wished in the future to be rid of the power of securing offices for his friends, and he makes this proposition: "Provided I am elected, you shall have the exclusive control of this patronage, so far as I am concerned," and as he is himself powerless, he threw himself on the magnanimity of Broderick for election to the Senate for the short term.

Was this letter spontaneous? We shall see. Broderick's headquarters were at the Magnolia, room No. 6, kept by Bally Johnson, father of our County Recorder. In the first number of this paper we erroneously called it the Sazarac, and we want to make a further correction of that paper, by fixing Monday afternoon, January 12, 1857, as the date of the Broderick-Redding interview. The headquarters of Gwin were at the Fashion, on the north side of J, between Second and Third.

On the evening of January 11th Dr. Gwin got rid of his friends earlier than usual, on a plea that he desired rest, put out his lights and ostensibly retired for the night. Each candidate had out his pickets to note any movement at their respective headquarters. But the pickets of Broderick and Gwin were for that evening withdrawn. The pickets of Lathan and Field were got rid of. There was an unusual lull in Gwin's camp that evening and a corresponding stillness at the Magnolia. The sleeping apartment of Gwin was at the Orleans Hotel and to that he retired about 11 P. M. He was not shadowed that night. His devoted friends had adopted methods to divert their watchers to another direction. A back court-yard to that hotel opened on the alley, extending north and south from J to K streets. About 12 midnight, of Sunday, January 11th, Dr. Gwin disguised and accompanied by a trusty friend, whose name has not transpired, went down a back stairway of the Orleans Hotel to the court, thence to the alley, thence north to J street, and crossing J street went directly to the Magnolia. A light rap was given. The door bolt was drawn by A. J. Butler, the trusted watch of Broderick. The visitors were evidently expected and they were conducted to Broderick's room. Broderick received them at the door, saying: "Good night, gentlemen, walk in; Dr. Gwin, I am glad to see." He seated Dr. Gwin, took the hand proffered, suitably responded and seated himself. His friend left and Broderick and Gwin were left alone. What took place there has not transpired. In their public speeches and manifestos during the bitter contest of 1859, neither referred to that interview and we may conclude that the seal of absolute secrecy imposed by each on the other as to the occurrences of that night has never been broken. But the result was the delivery of the letter we published. Whether the letter was prepared on the Saturday before that interview and correctly dated, or whether written at the interview and antedated is not known. The interview and its result were known to a few on the Monday following and some futile efforts were made by the friends of Broderick and Gwin to form a coalition to reconsider the nomination of Broderick and defeat both him and Gwin and elect other two as Senators. But this could not be done. The election took place and Broderick and Gwin became United States Senators. The leaders of the Democratic party fondly hoped that such election had harmonized the party in the State and rendered it invincible.

Dr. Gwin, on the day subsequent to the election, published an address to the people of California, in which he indicated his intention not to interfere with appointments to office, and crediting Broderick with his magnanimity in burying the hatchet for the great purpose of harmonizing the party. Gwin's friends claimed that this address put in the hands of Broderick was published earlier than agreed, and it caused much feeling. Broderick was conquerer, and he had Gwin, in chains, carried in triumphal procession. It turned out in the sequel that Redding was right in his views, and Broderick took nothing by his capture of Gwin. They were not long friends. Broderick was unable to get the ear of President Buchanan in securing appointments. He had an intense desire to secure for his friend, Frank Tilford, the appointment to the office of Collector of the port of San Francisco. But that office was the source of too much political power to be lightly surrendered, and whilst Gwin refused to act affirmatively in securing the appointment of a friend to that position, he yet had more influence with the administration than Broderick; and when, in the summer of 1857, President Buchanan appointed B. F. Washington to that position, Broderick came to an open rupture with the administration, and thenceforth his official life as Senator gave him no pleasure. He soon found that the slavery issue must be fought out, and that no real success could come to him whilst that institution was dominant, and the balance of his life was devoted to that end. Had he lived during the war of the rebellion, his voice in the United States Senate would have been heard in support of the preservation of the Union; and then, and not till then, could he have come to the full fruition of a life spent in securing freedom from the domination of the slave power.

THE PATH OF DUTY.

"How lucky you've got your hat on!" said Kitty Chaffer. "You'll be just in time, Priscilla, to come with us on an excursion."

It was Sunday morning, and the young shop girls were sunning themselves in the parlor of their dingy boarding house.

"I was going to church," said Miss Paine, with a wistful look at the sky. "I promised mother I would always—and, don't be offended, but I must decline to go."

"Oh, snit yourself," said Kitty, flouncing out of the room.

Whereupon Priscilla burst into tears and felt all the better for them. Then she dried her tears and went to church. And when she was snugly ensconced in her accustomed corner and ventured to look up she perceived that the old minister was not in his usual place. A fair-haired young man, with spectacles, occupied the pulpit. His topic was Home Missions. There was fire in his soul, magnetism in his voice. Priscilla found herself waking up; her eyes sparkled, her heart began to beat. It seemed as if his cry for aid in behalf of his work reached straight to her very soul.

"How glad I am," she thought, "that I did not go with Kitty Chaffer's party to-day!"

At the close of the sermon she waited at the church door.

"If you please, sir," said she, "you say that you want workers. Will you let me work for you? I have only Sunday and evenings; but surely that is something."

The young man looked benignly at her.

"There is work for every day and hour," said he, "Yes, I accept your offer willingly."

Some of the other girls in the congregation had volunteered also, and a little band of laborers was enrolled at once. Priscilla Paine was given a class of children in a crowded part of the city—an evening class—and she set herself bravely to work. It is possible that she exerted herself beyond her strength, for one sultry September evening she fainted at her post.

"This will not do," said the kindly young clergyman. "You need change and rest and fresh breezes and country air."

"I must contrive to do without them," said she.

"Come," said he, cheerily, "there must somewhere be a solution of this riddle. My mother is the best old lady in the world, and you shall go out and help her at Daisy Farm for a week or two."

"If I can earn my bread there," said Priscilla humbly.

So she went out to Daisy Farm and Mr. Trenton came down at the expiration of a month to find the shadowy, pale Priscilla gone, and a rosy, sun-burned maiden in her stead, gathering bright autumn leaves along the woodland paths.

"Are you ready to go back Miss Paine," said he.

"Quite ready," Priscilla answered, drooping her head and blushing a little.

"No, she isn't!" sturdy Caleb Trenton, the young minister's farmer brother, made reply. "She isn't going back at all, Herbert. She is going to stay with me for good and all."

"If—if you don't mind!" whispered Priscilla. "Caleb says he loves me, and I am quite sure that I love him!"

Herbert Trenton glanced keenly from one to the other of these young people.

"I am glad of it," he said kindly.

And Priscilla never knew how near she had been to the heart of the young man with the spectacles and the magnetic voice.

She had been married over a year when, going up to the city to buy some lace for her first baby's christening robe, she saw Kitty Chaffer behind the counter.

"So it is you, is it?" said Kitty. And Priscilla saw that she was pale and haggard, and had a reckless light in her eyes, a hard, inharmonious jangle in her voice. "Happily married, eh? and all that sort of thing! Well, some folks have all the luck. I almost wish, Priscilla, that I had staid away from Rockaway Beach that Sunday, and gone to church with you! Did you ever hear how it turned out? We had a regular frolic, we young folks. We went bathing in the surf and we rode on the merry-go-rounds. And Jane Ellis' young man and me played get married, just for a joke; and, will you believe it, the lawyers said it was a real marriage, and Jane hasn't spoken to him since, nor to me, just as if I was to blame. And he's taken to drink, and keeps bothering me for money and threatening to take me away with him—he a man whom I perfectly hate! And Harry Sanderson has got engaged to another girl, after giving me a ring and all, because he said he didn't approve of the way I acted. And, altogether," added poor Kitty, bursting into tears, "I wish I was dead and out of my troubles. And it all came from that Sunday pleasuring. Here comes the shopwalker. Don't take any notice, Priscilla. Yes'm," Kitty added smartly, "we sell a great deal of this Oriental lace for babies' clothes; it washes and wears beautiful. Ten yards, did you say?"

Priscilla Trenton, riding home from the station in the twilight, with her baby on her lap and honest Caleb at her side, thanked Heaven that she had chosen the right path on that summer Sunday morning when good and bad angels strove together on her behalf.

Inducing Hypnotism.

In view of the uncertainty, and the frequent failures which accompany the use of brilliant substances, and particularly, too, of the sustained attention and the fatigue required to develop hypnotism in new patients, I conceived the idea of presenting the brilliant substance mechanically instead of holding it in my own hand, giving it at the same time a rotary motion in order to increase its influence. A patient required to keep his eyes fixed on bright particles which are revolving before him, feels a sense of weariness after one or two minutes; he is insensibly fascinated, and to one's surprise, one sees him gradually close his eyes and lie back in his chair, like a person falling asleep. He is then in the state of lethargy.

Since I took to using revolving mirrors to produce hypnotic sleep, I have never failed to be satisfied with the results. After two or three minutes patients of either sex, who are operated on, show themselves equally quick in feeling the effect, the old and the young alike. It can also be shown that this sleep, mechanically produced, is not, as might be expected, a natural sleep; but, on the contrary, it is a peculiar kind of sleep, for which I suggest the term mechanical sleep. It brings about in the nervous system a very special condition, which is distinguished by a general anesthesia of the integuments, a catalepsy of the muscles, and a tendency to act upon any suggestions made.

The importance of the practical results of this new method, which brings about hypnotism without fatigue and of prolonged duration, while it also enables one to subject several patients at once to the influence of hypnotism is easily comprehended. Every day by its application I can have eight or ten patients in my laboratory, who are all hypnotized together by the influence of a single revolving mirror, placed in the center of them. There is also an extremely interesting point to be deduced from the use of this method, viz.: that by being thus able to produce without difficulty a state of trance in a number of patients, the patients are brought to a special condition of the nerves, by means of which they become ready to accept other influences and to undergo therapeutic influence.

By this means I have been enabled to bring about a series of valuable practical results, such as the stopping of sharp pains, the restoration of sleep to persons tortured by prolonged insomnia, the renewal of the powers of locomotion in paralytics, and, in short, a number of improvements of very distinct character and of long duration. Besides, I may say this in favor of the new methods which I have adopted, that out of two hundred patients actually brought under my notice I have never observed a single accident. The process, therefore, is perfectly harmless; and when employed with skill and prudence I am thoroughly convinced that it can produce no harmful effects in the persons experimented upon.—Dr. Luys in Fortnightly Review.

Milk Without Ice.

The following description by a physician of his method of keeping milk sweet all day in hot weather without ice, is reproduced from the Baltimore Sun:

"The method is this: The milk when bought is at once put into ten or twelve bottles—yeast bottles are good enough—one bottle for each nursing. As much water as is desired is added, say one-sixth or one-quarter the amount of the milk. The bottles, which ought not to be quite full, are then corked tightly with a wad of raw cotton two or three inches long. The bottles are next placed, five or six at a time, in a pan of water, which is heated to boiling for at least half an hour. The bottles are then put in the shade, still corked with the cotton; and when the baby wants to nurse, one of the bottles is unstopped and the nipple is put on as usual.

"One of my patients keeps milk fresh all day in this way, putting it into a cupboard without any ice; and the milk agrees nicely with her baby. My belief is, that the introduction of this method will save hundreds of children's lives every summer. This method is founded on scientific teaching, and is practically the same as that used in the best children's sanitariums. The idea is to destroy all disease matter that has got into the milk, and not let any more get in. The cotton strains out from the air any disease matter that may be in it.

"Of course, the bottles must be cleaned immediately after each nursing with hot water and soap, and then filled with cooking soda and water until they are used again. The nipple and rubber tube, if one is used, must be very carefully cleaned, also. Milk prepared in this way is very nearly, if not quite, as wholesome as if it were drunk directly from the cow. This method will, of course, not make sour milk sweet; but if the milk comes from the dairy sweet it will keep it sweet for several days, and it will destroy disease germs that have fallen into the milk. Milk prepared in this way is generally much more wholesome than 'condensed milk' or 'baby foods.' Children who are fed all summer in this way, if they take nothing but this milk and water which has been well boiled, are likely to go all summer without any disease of the stomach or bowels."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

"Mother is My Sweetheart," is the title of the latest song. It is said that this song excels in sentiment and sweetness.

J. L. Toole, the comedian, presented Henry Irving with a kangaroo; and Irving, with equal generosity, presented it to the London Zoo.

Sybil Sanderson has a voice that ranges higher than Patti's; but Patti has the advantage of having terms that range considerably higher than Sybil's.

Edwin Booth, who has himself played the part of Hamlet thousands of times, has never yet seen it played by any one else. He ought to see Wilson Barrett just once in the "Melancholy Dane."

Margaret Mather is abroad preparing for the American production of Joan d'Arc, with which Bernhardt made such a success recently at the Porte St. Martin Theater, Paris. Miss Mather is now in London hobnobbing with the divine Sara.

Corra Myrtle Carpenter, of Hannibal, Mo., known as "the child medium," fourteen years of age, is creating a sensation in the West by her "inspired" lectures. She talks learnedly on subjects suggested by her audience, such as "Progression," "Why Was Jesus Called the Messiah?" "Is the Human Spirit Immortal?" etc. She recently spoke an hour on one of these subjects, and astonished her hearers by the masterly manner in which she handled it.

The richest actor in the country to day is Joseph Jefferson. Edwin Booth is supposed to have more money, but this is an error. Mr. Booth has earned large sums; but, while modest enough in his own life, he has expended them generously, and besides, has disbursed a fortune to liquidate the indebtedness incurred during his disastrous managerial career in New York. Mr. Jefferson, on the other hand has been a steady accumulator. From the time he began to make more than a living as an actor, he has saved some of the surplus. He has lived well but not extravagantly. He has provided generously for his family, but not wastefully. Such investments as he has made have been wise ones, and whatever speculating he may have indulged in has averaged a profit. Nobody but himself knows how much he is worth. He probably knows it to a cent; for, while not penurious, he is exact and business like. One of the men closest to him, and certainly most conversant with his business, remarked the other day that Jefferson must be a millionaire, if not doubly so. Probably the single million is nearest to it.

Chipper little Della Fox, the soubrette of the Hopper Opera Company, prides herself, says the New York Star, on the fact that she never allows anything, no matter how embarrassing, to disconcert her. A few afternoons ago, however, the cool little lady had an experience in which, as she expresses it, "her bluff was called, and she had to admit defeat." She was walking on Broadway with a friend, when they chanced to pass a young man who carried a light overcoat on his arm. Miss Fox carried an umbrella in her hand, and as she passed the young man she accidentally caught his overcoat with the handle of her umbrella. She turned round at once, and looking the young man in the face, said, holding out the umbrella: "You may have it if you want it." The young man was staggered for an instant, but he quickly controlled himself, and reaching out his hand said "thank you," with a polite bow, as he took the proffered umbrella and walked away with it. The next day a messenger boy brought the umbrella to the theater with a note, which said: "I always call a bluff, no matter how small a hand I hold." The note was unsigned, and Miss Fox does not yet know who the young man was.

Book Chat.

Count Tolst's Kreutzer Sonata receives a new boom by being suppressed in Austria as "dangerous to the State."

Tennyson does the greater part of his literary work in the morning between breakfast and lunch, and loaf the rest of the day. If the results of his labor are all like his later productions, it would be better for him to loaf all the time.

Having a severe cold in the head, a literary friend of mine had taken a hot bath before retiring and a dose of fine whiskey, says the Washington Post. "I slept like a log," he says, "until about 5 o'clock. When I awoke my head was as clear as a bell and I found myself interested in a peculiar story which in all symmetry was passing through my mind. The plot was somewhat complicated, but thoroughly artistic. I was astonished, and at first thought my memory was recalling some tale that I had read. As I reviewed the story, however, I realized that it was eminently original. Much pleased at this seeming presentation from the gods of a literary nugget, I composed myself to sleep, and in the morning found that the tale was still mine. Some weeks later I received an order from a syndicate for a story of 10,000 words. I had 36 hours in which to produce the manuscript. The plot that had been the outcome of a hot bath, whiskey and sound sleep now came into play, and I had no difficulty in completing my story within the allotted time. As I received $150 for it, I am now patiently awaiting another cold in the head."

Professional Chat.

"It is thoroughly understood now," said a well-known physician, "that nervousness and fright have as much to do with precipitating evil effects from dog bite as the actual poison itself. As the dog season approaches, nervous people experience what may almost be called a reign of terror on the general subject of rabies. In my practice I have known of men and women who were almost on the verge of hysteria from a trifling scratch or bite from a pet poodle, and in at least two instances I have known serious trouble to result from this species of fright. More dog-bitten people have died from imagination than from the rabies you know, and the direct outcome of sensationalism on the subject is towards an increase in the number of victims."

Senator Harris, of Tennessee, had an experience some years ago with a new committee clerk at the Capitol, says the New York Tribune. He went into the room of the Committee on Claims one afternoon, and asked the clerk to show him the papers in a case under consideration by the committee. "Are you the claimant?" said the clerk, abruptly. Senator Harris replied that he was not the claimant. "Are you the attorney in the case?" said the clerk, with still greater abruptness. Senator Harris replied that he was not even the attorney. "Well, who in — are you, then, and what interest have you got in this case?" said the clerk in a very offensive tone. "I introduced the bill in the Senate," said Senator Harris, mildly, "and I am somewhat interested in it for that reason." The clerk refused for some time to believe this statement, and I believe Mr. Harris was obliged to call some one in eventually to identify him.

Representative Nathan Frank, of Missouri, is one of the proprietors of a daily newspaper, says the New York Tribune. He is one of many newspaper proprietors who sit in the halls of Congress. About a year ago the manager of Mr. Frank's newspaper conceived the idea of offering an accident policy carrying $500 insurance with each copy of the paper. I asked Mr. Frank the other day what value the accident policy had proved to his publication. "Oh, well," he said, in a discouraged tone, "it advertised us a little for a time, but then no one died." I expressed some surprise at this view of the case, suggesting that as no one had died Mr. Frank had saved just $500. "Yes," said the member from the Ninth Missouri District, "we saved $500, but we lost an advertisement that would have been worth a great many thousands to us. If some one had been found dead with one of those accident policies of ours in his pocket, we would have had the people of the whole town buying copies of the paper every evening, in the vain hope that they might fall dead too, and thus obtain the coveted reward. We lost a great deal of money by the perverse failure of our subscribers to die suddenly on the day of publication."

"I witnessed a very laughable incident last winter," said a Frankfort man the other day, "and the moral, if there be any, is that a man should know the crowd before whom he talks indiscriminately. It was in the Court of Appeals chamber just after the adjournment. A crowd of gentlemen were sitting around, and the chief spokesman was a loquacious member of the Frankfort genus loafer, who was not acquainted with all present. One of the brightest young lawyers in the State had just stepped out after making a speech. He had been drinking and the Frankfort man said: 'What a mistake some fellows make in thinking they speak better when they are half full of whiskey. Now, I have heard that our two senators keep soaking full when on duty, and I think it a shame.' 'One of them has quit,' quietly remarked one of the gentlemen present. 'Which one?' was the query. 'I have,' answered Senator Blackburn, and he he got up and walked out. The dumbfounded man caught his breath and said: 'Well, now, that was one dirty break of mine. I didn't know Blackburn was within a thousand miles of here. But I don't care. I have heard that Senator Blackburn drinks too much to sustain even a Kentuckian's reputation.' Still another stranger spoke up with, 'Well, he just never did drink to excess, and I know that Uncle Joe hasn't touched a drink in a year.' It was Senator Blackburn's nephew this time, and the talkative man made his escape without standing on the order of his going."

NOTES.

The bugs are out in full force these warm nights. Mosquitoes are exceedingly and annoyingly plentiful.

Some of the city officials visited the cemetery yesterday. If some of the "leading" citizens would accompany some of the "officials" to the cemetery and remain there, an era of prosperity might dawn on the city. A few first class funerals would not be regretted.

A man named Kidney jumped from a moving train near Roseville, Wednesday, and was badly hurt. However, a daily paper says he made no complaint of any one as he alone was to blame. Of course not, otherwise it would have been a kidney complaint.

It is quite evident that THEMIS is on too high an intellectual plane for Supervisor Geo. O. Bates. When he in his utter ignorance and stupidity professes to a lack of knowledge regarding the existence of THEMIS, he "writes himself down as ass"—a veritable Dogberry.

The reading portion of the working classes had just about satisfied themselves that the State Library Trustees had given them opportunity of reading a few hours in the evening and all day Sunday, when suddenly the fond anticipation is dashed aside by a proposed set of new resolutions.

There is a drummer traveling for a wholesale clothing house of Cincinnati, and his name is Frederick Vanvonderbinkenstaufen! He says his brother married a Miss Fechheimfrenklander. He says the couple have a boy a few days old, yet unnamed, and that he is using his influence to have the child given its mother's surname, so it can be called Fechheimfrenklander Vanvonderbinkenstaufen.

The French-American Mackays are determined to find out whether or not Mrs. Mackay was ever a washerwoman. John W. has just authorized his solicitors in London to offer a reward of £200 to any one who in a calendar month will find out the parties who have been circulating the vile slander. It would thus appear to make no difference if the fact is discovered after the lapse of a month. See cablegram of July 10th.

The census returns show the following population of towns and cities: Temescal, 2,205; Loring, 756; Golden Gate, 772; Emeryville, 174; Sonoma, 1,457; San Andreas, town, 455; township, 1,622; Lockford, 473; Clements, 335; San Pablo, 411; Pinole, 362; Selby's, 193; Port Costa, 630; Georgetown, 313; San Lorenzo, 300; San Leandro, 1,850; Folsom, 722; Rocklin, 1,042; Martinez, 1,570; Oakland will have close to 50,000; Sacramento, about 27,000; Lodi, 1,018.

The friends of Miss Nellie Siddons are urging the Board of Education to appoint her teacher of the French language in the public schools. Miss Siddons is a very accomplished young lady, and is a master of the French and Latin languages. The young lady is the daughter of Captain Wm. M. Siddons, and is a native of this city. From early youth she has evinced a marked development as a linguist, and has been given by her parents a full scope to her inclinations in the study of this language. No better choice could be made by the Board of Education.

On the 5th of July a quiet wedding occurred at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Prideaux. The contracting parties were Jas. A. Davis, of this city, and Alice M. Nugent, of Antioch. Judge John W. Armstrong performed the ceremony, in fulfillment of an understanding he had with the groom some years ago. We were interested in the matter in that an editor of this paper was rather closely related to one of the parties. Mr. Davis is well known in this city, and enjoys a large circle of acquaintances. To them this movement, not of a military nature, has been a surprise.

Celibacy is positively declared by the Talmud to be a sinful state, the unmarried man to be virtually guilty of homicide. The celibate lives without blessing, without joy, without peace. He is not truly a man; his life lacks that completeness and dignity which marriage alone can give. There is a decline in the adherence to the Talmudic doctrine of late years. Woman is in reality the prime cause of the celibate state in many, very many instances. There are too many show girls, typewriters, and a too general embarking into business avocations by women, to add anything to home life—to the marital relation. There is, in fact, a general absence of domestic affection. The proportionate decrease in children population in many localities can be laid to this state of affairs.

The slighting reference made of THEMIS, by the Bee, discloses a very mean and ungrateful spirit. There is no interior paper on the coast so widely quoted from as THEMIS. Yet our neighbor, because THEMIS succeeded in securing some county advertising, on merit alone, loses its temper and says some mean things.

Among the excellent weekly papers of the cities of California, the Sacramento THEMIS has front rank. It is handsomely made up, well conducted, displays care and talent and discrimination, and is alike entertaining at the reading-room and in the seclusion of the family circle, to the young and to the aged. It holds to the genius of its classic name.—Fresno Republican.

Word comes that Boss Buckley will no longer take an active part in politics, but content himself with remaining at home and aiding by his counsel and advice. Well that will not be much of a change from past methods, for Buckley was never very active in the sense of traveling about as he must always have a guide to lead him. However, it is to be hoped that if he means what he says it will not be a case of from bad to worse but that his party may be purified by his retirement.

Way back in the old Western States and far out on the prairie there used to be vast gangs of cranes, and they were divided into two families: the beautiful, graceful blue crane, that hunters refrained from firing upon; then there was the long-legged, long-necked, croaking sandhill crane, that was a gluttonous destroyer of all kinds of vegetation, and that had no sympathetic vein in its carcass or gratitude in its nature. They were the delight of hunters, who slaughtered them because they cumbered the earth. To that family of cranes belongs W. M., the o'erfatted and petted actor who, dirty bird like, has fouled his own nest by his recent lying attack on California. His next visit will be patiently awaited.

Sacramento city has a beautiful public plaza at Tenth and J streets. The city is supposed to take due care of the same. She pays a man whose duty it is to attend to this little park. It seems, however, that somebody in authority neglects to enforce the proper care of this public square. The splendid statue of A. J. Stevens which adorns the park, is not even incentive enough to prompt the care of the park. For several months the grass has been permitted to grow in the gutters surrounding the plaza, which gives it a generally neglected appearance. The city authorities owe it to the people to see that this resort is attended and not suffered to fall in decay. We have enough slovenly streets, sidewalks, not to mention the old "49" tumble down buildings that disgrace our fair name, without allowing this handsome little park to go to ruin. A little prodigious is necessary in some quarters.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Orpheus Male Quartet, is the name adopted by four young gentlemen well known in musical and amateur dramatic circles of this city. The quartet is composed of Rich. T. Cohn, 1st tenor, Chas. T. Millikin, 2d tenor, W. H. Kinross, baritone and director, Horace Crocker, basso.

If what is reported against W. H. Crane is true, then he is one of the most ungrateful of men. In California—Sacramento particularly, he received his first recognition and was "boomed" into notoriety. In addition, when he returns he is met with a grand reception whereby his pockets are lined with our gold, and new laurels of favors added. Then he goes away and blackens his friends and benefactors. His ingratitude will yet cost him dear, let us prophesy. John T. Raymond did the same thing that has been credited to Crane, and he died poor and unhonored. We fear Crane has a severe attack of enlarged cabessa. It may be necessary to resort to measures for its reduction.

Mrs. Geo. Senf has just returned from the Normal School at San Jose, where she had been attending the graduating exercises, in which her daughter, Eva E. Senf, was one of the graduating class. The young lady acquitted herself with distinction.

A Little Paradise.

P. H. Blake, the census enumerator who enumerated a little place called "Bay Farm Island," which is part of the corporation of Alameda city, thus reports the island: This island is devoted to raising asparagus and other early vegetables. Every day's business is settled. No one keeps any books but a bank book. The Cleveland nursery sells for cash to actual consumers. There are sometimes one hundred and fifty Chinamen cutting and packing asparagus for several weeks. There are no tramps, no lawyers no doctors, only one public school—large children go to the city of Alameda—no police, no saloon, no crime. Everybody has money.

Political.

Matters in Republican politics are becoming somewhat warm. Of course, it is no different this time than it has been at this stage in any previous campaign. Largely, of course, the dissensions that always occur are due to the selfishness of individuals; but we apprehend, when the convention will have concluded its work and placed before us the ticket, it will be satisfactory. So far as we have been able to ascertain, the gentlemen who will aspire to nominations will be: For Assemblyman, Eighteenth District—Hon. W. M. Petrie (the present incumbent), Hon. Jud. C. Brusie, Edward I. Robinson, D. J. Simmons, Hon. R. J. Van Voorhies, Dr. C. E. Pinkham, and Dr. G. M. Dixon. From the Nineteenth District—Hon. Elwood Bruner. From the Twentieth District—J. J. Campbell, the editor of the Galt Gazette. For Superior Judge, it is generally conceded Judge Van Fleet will be renominated without dissent. His administration during the last six years has been satisfactory to the people regardless of party. For the other judgeship, the contest will be among Hon. R. T. Devlin, and Judges A. P. Catlin and J. C. Tubbs. For County Clerk, the present incumbent, Wm. B. Hamilton, and Deputy Clerk, W. W. Rhoads will contest. The candidates for the other offices are: For Sheriff—The present incumbent, Geo. C. McMullen, and Hiram W. Johnson, of Union House. For Assessor—The present incumbent, A. L. Frost, S. W. Butler, Jos. W. Houston, Thos. H. Berkey, John T. Griffiths, and Joseph Sims. For Treasurer—The present incumbent, J. L. Hutton, A. S. Greenlaw, E. Lyon, and A. E. Hornleiu. For District Attorney—Hon. Frank D. Ryan, Jay R. Brown, Lincoln White, and W. A. Anderson. For Auditor and Recorder—The present incumbent, Frank T. Johnson, and James A. Graham, of Elk Grove. For School Superintendent—The present incumbent, Benj. F. Howard, and J. E. Blanchard. For Public Administrator—The present incumbent, G. W. Harlow, and N. L. Drew. For Coroner—J. W. Reeves and Geo. H. Clark. For Supervisor, First District—A. J. Senatz, and possibly Dr. F. F. Tebbets, though we are not informed whether the Doctor will be a candidate. For Supervisor, Fifth District—W. H. Dixon and A. M. Plummer. For Police Judge—The present incumbent, Henry L. Buckley, and G. G. Davis. For City Justices—The present incumbents, James B. Devine and C. W. Baker, and also Col. Henry Starr and T. W. Humphreys. This constitutes the list, so far as we are able to ascertain, but there will doubtless be others of whom we have not heard; but it will be understood that no omission has been made by intention on our part.

We can say candidly there is an abundance of material presented from which to form an excellent ticket, and there is not a gentleman whose name we have mentioned whom we could not earnestly support, and who will not merit the undivided support of the party.

There is but one consideration we ask. It is that those who will go before the convention will be treated with fairness. If a slate has been prepared, wisdom should dictate to its manufacturers that it be broken, for it is but reasonable that a candidate who may appear before a convention and ascend the platform with the realization that he will be slaughtered, will leave the hall justly feeling bitter.

It is but due that commendation should be expressed of the administration of Mr. White, the chairman of the County Central Committee. We have a full realization, from our own experience, of the troubles with which he has been beset. He has, however, discharged the duties of his office with excellent judgment and commendable firmness. The position is one of peculiar trial, and particularly when the time approaches for the calling of the primaries, the chairman has to manifest backbone; he passes through the ordeal of having his motives impugned by those who insist he will pursue a course that will result in advantage to individuals or factions. We have always believed there should be some reward to the one who fills this position. As it is, to properly discharge the duties, involves the expenditure of much labor and money by this officer.

It must be conceded there is a movement in progress in this county to defeat the reelection of a Republican Federal Senator. The readers of this paper know we have not joined in the subservient flattery of Senator Stanford, when he has visited this city, and criticism came from some of his friends that we did not kneel to him that he had wealth. However, it has been that at no time have we forgotten the merits of the man and that which he has done, and believed he will do for the laboring classes in this community. We fully appreciate that in this matter we are antagonizing those who have taken a contract from Mr. Huntington to defeat Senator Stanford in his old home, and that we are treading upon dangerous ground. We feel we will incur the enmity of those who are in politics for coin only.

There was organized here within the last week a secret political club composed entirely of gentlemen who have managed what is known as the "purity" faction of the party. While some of the announced objects meet with our cordial approval and while we know that very many of those who were present are sincere, yet we are fully satisfied some of the leading members have, through that organization, the sole purpose to disrupt the Republican party here, with the view to cripple Senator Stanford.

The Bee of this city has very plainly put this matter. It seems that to tide over what had been suspected, that in the meeting a resolution endorsing him was introduced. At the conclusion of that resolution of endorsement were these words: Resolved, That to this end we will countenance no proposition looking to a division of the Republican strength in Sacramento county, but will work for the success of the whole Republican ticket in the coming Fall election.

The Bee publishes, and it has not been denied, that Hon. Grove L. Johnson moved to strike out the above resolution, and that the motion prevailed. Two weeks ago we called attention to the fact that Mr. Johnson had taken the liberty to publish a letter he had received from the enemy of Senator Stanford, but he neglected to give publicity to the letter he had himself written that elicited response from the President of the Southern Pacific Company. We had assumed Mr. Johnson was a man of sufficient courage to stand by that he wrote. 't seems we are mistaken, and also that he is willing to strike down his friend.

Upon the heels of this covert letter, we find the establishment of a secret political club, to defeat one who has been the consistent friend of this city and county; we find an attempt made to deprive those who are engaged in railroad service from the exercise of their political rights. The source cannot be misunderstood. The people of this county are, however, intelligent. We have full confidence that, irrespective of party, if those who are employed by the corporation here be will permitted to fairly express themselves, they will be almost to a man in favor of the reelection of Senator Stanford, and if they understand as we do, the nature of the opposition that is and will be made to him, it will be severely rebuked. We believe in dealing with matters political that the truth shall be told.

The County Central Committee met at the Court House last night. After a full opportunity for discussion in open meeting an executive session was held with the reporters present. The Committee carefully considered the questions before it, and resolved to call the primaries in the city in six precincts, and apportioned the delegates in accordance with the directions of the last County Convention. The result is satisfactory.

The following is a letter from "The Mathushek Piano M'fg Co., New Haven, Conn.:"

JUNE 23, 1890.

JOHN F. COOPER, ESQ.:

Dear Sir—Replying to your letter of the 4th inst., will say that we enclose copy of report of the Mathushek & Son Co., also a copy of the Musical Courier, containing an article relating to these people.

The above mentioned is all the information we have in the matter. It is very evident from the above report that the concern is not in a shape financially to do a very extensive business, but of course rival and unscrupulous dealers will make all they can out of it, in the hope of putting something else forward. It is only another of those desperate attempts to make capital from the name and reputation the Mathushek piano has gained. As a matter of fact it is really gratifying to see how much the name is appreciated, and that it is considered so valuable that previous failures don't seem to dampen the ardor of the projectors. We are confident in the belief, however, from the financial standing of the new concern, that no longer lease of life will be accorded them than was granted their predecessors. The Mathushek Piano is pretty well installed and we hardly think the public will be beguiled into buying a piano made by Jacob Brothers, for a Mathushek. A few may be influenced at first, but it will end like all the other attempts, in a first class advertisement.

Yours very respectfully,

* THE MATHUSHEK PIANO M'FG CO.

GOLD IN 1844.

An Interesting Conversation With General Bidwell on the Subject.

SACRAMENTO, July 10, 1890.

Editors THEMIS: In the course of a conversation with General Bidwell, the other day, at his residence in Chico, he stated some facts in regard to early days and the discovery of gold, that struck me as being entirely new and exceedingly interesting. With his consent I jotted down a few notes, and am glad to give your readers the benefit. The General was speaking of the purely accidental nature of Marshall's discovery, in that he happened to dig his tail-race through a gravelly bar containing gold, and to have a stream of water, clear as crystal, and strong enough to carry off all the sand and loose gravel, and so expose the gold. He himself was surveying grants in the Sacramento valley that winter and was not on the spot.

"But," said he, "it seems entirely providential that gold was not discovered earlier, for otherwise England would have had California, and the United States would have never survived the Civil War, as nothing but California's gold carried the credit of the Government through that period and saved the nation. It was well known by some of us that gold existed in the foothills, and we were very near discovering it on several occasions. We judged by the experience of Mexicans, who were mining near Los Angeles, however, and didn't imagine that gold existed in any large quantity or we would certainly have found it. In the summer and fall of 1843 and the spring of 1844, I had charge of General Sutter's great stock farm along the foothills. Among the men under me was a Mexican named Pablo Gutierrez, a native of Sinaloa, Mexico, and familiar with placer mining. Him I appointed one of my overseers over the vaqueros in charge of a band of cattle. One day he was missing, having gone up into the mountains contrary to orders. When he came back he came to me confidentially and told me he had made a great discovery, not of gold, but of the signs of gold, and that he was positive it was there. In a few days the two of us went off quietly to the spot—it was on Bear river—where he had found his indications, and I tried to have him go ahead and actually discover the gold. He claimed, however, that he could do nothing without a batea, or wooden bowl used by the Mexicans in washing for gold, and as I knew nothing about mining at the time, I had to let it go. I then proposed to him to have a certain man make a batea, but he said it could not be done just right, it was impossible with the tools they had, etc. I then proposed that he should go to Sinaloa and get one. He was willing, but fearing that he might not return if he got down among his people, I made another proposition—that we should save up our earnings for a year, and both go to Boston in one of the ships that came to the Coast for hides, where we could have a batea made and return for the gold. Gutierrez agreed, and matters stood thus, we having agreed not to divulge the matter. This was in March, 1844. In the fall of that year, before we were ready to start, the Mexican Chiefs of California got up the insurrection against the Governor, expelling him. We Americans took sides with the Governor, and Pablo being friendly to us did so likewise. He was entrusted with dispatches to the Governor, at Monterey, and safely made one trip. He was sent on a second trip to tell him we were on the march, but unfortunately was taken prisoner on this second trip and hanged as a traitor near the location of Gilroy, in Santa Clara county.

Bearing in mind the information I had about gold on Bear river, I went, in the spring of 1845, to the place where the Mexicans were working the mines, near Los Angeles. Their careless manner of work, their inefficient means and their almost insignificant returns were very disheartening, and I felt almost like abandoning my quest for gold. This especially, as in 1843, a Dr. Sautals, a distinguished naturalist and scientist, who had been with Humboldt in South America, happened to visit the coast, and of course called on General Sutter. Sutter said to him, half jokingly:

"I want you to discover a gold mine for me, Doctor, so that I can carry out my plans!"

He advised strongly against any such attempt, relating some sad experiences of his own in connection with gold mining in Brazil, and telling the General he had a better gold mine in his fertile fields. Dr. Sautals, nevertheless, in the course of a trip up the valley as far as Chico creek, which he made out of curiosity and to collect specimens, in which I accompanied him, discovered many indications of gold. He kept continually assuring us, however, that from the appearance of things he did not think it existed in paying quantities, and advised us to pay no more attention to it. So, you see, we were not wholly unaware of the existence of gold in the mountains.

Well, I returned to Sacramento in 1845, and engaged to stay with Sutter and manage his farm for a year. One day, that summer, I sent some men to saw out lumber on the Mokelumne river. During the day I rode over to see how they were getting on, and having a spare hour or two on my hands, thought I would look around for more indications of gold. I climbed over a steep ridge and went part way down into a gulch on the other side, but it was an exceedingly hot day, so I gave up and did not go down, but went back home. Next year was the Bear Flag war, and the change of sovereignty, and then came Marshall's discovery. In 1848 we were all of us working, but in the spring of 1849 I went over to the Mokelumne river, to the old saw camp and to my gulch again, when I found that it was one of the richest gulches ever struck. Had I gone down that hot day and simply pulled up a bunch of grass, I could hardly have failed to find some gold on its roots."

I ask General Bidwell's pardon, if there are any inaccuracies in the above. He spoke so interestingly that sometimes I slipped in my notes. Yours, etc., R. A. C.

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 92° and 52°, as against 89° and 52°, for the same time last year. It will therefore be seen that there is very little difference in the weather now and what it was one year ago.

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos.

The immense stock of E. Lyon & Co. is now being closed out. The values they are offering in dress goods, etc., is sure to dispose of the balance of the stock very soon. It will pay you to call and see their prices. *

It has often been said that the world consists mainly of fools, and one proof of it is that each individual fool is eager to apply the statement to humanity at large.

Republican Primary and Convention

Resolved:—By the Republican Central Committee of Sacramento County, that in accordance with the provisions of Sections 1357 to 1365, inclusive, of the Political Code, and the sections of law referred to therein, a Republican Primary Election will be held in the County of Sacramento, on between the hours of 12 o'clock M. and 7 o'clock P. M., in Sacramento City, and between the hours of 2 P. M. and 5 P. M., in the precincts outside said city, during which time the polls will be kept open; said Primary Election being for the purpose of electing delegates to a Republican County Convention to be held on the 24th day of July, 1890, at 1 P. M., which County Convention will be held for the purpose of selecting twenty-five delegates to the Republican State Convention to meet at Sacramento on August 12th, 1890, to select delegates to such Republican Congressional and District Conventions as may hereafter be called, to nominate candidates for the various County, Township and City offices to be voted for at the next general election, to select a County Central Committee, and to transact such other business as may come before said County Convention.

That said Primary Election shall be held under the provisions of law above referred to.

That in the precincts in the City of Sacramento all ballots used at said Primary Election shall be printed in conformity with the provisions of the Political Code relating to the form of ballots, but this provision need not be applied to precincts in the County outside said City.

That the qualifications required of voters at said Primary Election, in addition to those required by law, shall be that the voter belongs to the Republican Party, that he voted for the Harrison and Morton electors at the last Presidential Election, or would have so voted if he had been permitted to vote, and pledges himself to vote the Republican ticket at the coming election. And no person shall be allowed to vote in any precinct unless his name is on the printed Precinct Register for such precinct, or on the printed Supplement to the Great Register of said County, but each Republican voter shall be permitted to vote in the precinct where his name is found on the printed Register.

That said County Convention will be held at such place in Sacramento City as will hereafter be designated by the Chairman of this Committee.

That notice of the holding of said Primary Election, and said County Convention shall be given by publication of this resolution in the Sacramento Daily Record Union, Sacramento Daily Bee for at least five days next preceding such Primary Election, and once each in THEMIS, Leader, Galt Gazette and Folsom Telegraph.

That said Primary Election shall be held at the following places, and the following named persons shall constitute the Election Boards, and the respective precincts shall be entitled to the following number of Delegates:

"His Name Is Dennis."

The Pittsburg Dispatch man thus gives an account of the origin of the saying, "His Name is Dennis." Whence, by the way, comes the phrase, "His name is Dennis?" My ignorance is deplorable doubtless, but I found a score of wise men and women yesterday who are in the same boat. One authority I consulted said: "I have a vague idea that some fellow whose name was Dennis got hung. Somebody who did not know of this tragic fact asked afterward what had become of 'Mister' Dennis, and the answer he got was: 'His name is Dennis.'"

In my search after the origin of the phrase, I came upon the record of a certain John Dennis, an English critic and poet in a small way, who lived in the eighteenth century. In his capacity of critic he wrote a savage review of Pope's "Essay on Man," and the revengeful poet replied by immortalizing Mr. Dennis in "The Dunciad" after this fashion:

Should Dennis publish you had stabb'd your brother,

Say, what revenge on Dennis can be had? Too dull for laughter, for reply too mad; On one so poor you cannot take the law; On one so old your sword you scorn to draw. Uncaged then let the harmless monster rage, Secure in dullness, want and senile age.

Pasteur has treated during the past three years 7,893 persons bitten by mad dogs, and of this number only thirty-three died. These figures seem to overcome the theory that the Pasteur treatment is not effective.

Mrs. Peattie, of the editorial department of an Omaha paper, writes to a friend: "I sit in the editorial chair and write about everything, from the Oklahoma bill down to the local political steals. Then when big, blustering men puff up our three flights of rickety stairs and thunder: 'Who wrote that piece in this morning's paper?' I answer, smilingly, 'I did.'" Sullivan himself could not end the matter quicker."

The new postal cards which will shortly be printed, are of two sizes—an idea of the Postmaster-General's—the bigger ones, which have twice the area of the present postal cards, being intended for business communications that cannot very well be crowded, and for other purposes demanding space. Both kinds have, in the right hand upper corner, instead of the representation of a stamp, a small portrait of General Grant, which is undoubtedly the worst ever executed.—Boston Transcript.

Icebergs originate in West Greenland, which Ensign Rodman, of the hydrographic office, calls "the great berg factory." The ice massed in the interior of the country is gradually forced out to sea by glacial movements on land, which advance at the rate of at least fifty feet a day. The glacier is broken into huge masses, when once in the water, by its buoyancy and brittleness, and the currents. This process is called calving. A berg varies in size, the average being 60 to 100 feet high and 300 to 500 yards long of exposed surface, which is usually an eighth of the whole mass.

L. D. Armstrong, of Norwich, Conn., has just published the following letter which was found in a batch of old papers in 1867, in a paper mill in that city:

"MOUNT VERNON, Jan. 22, 1788.—DEAR SIR: As you have no immediate occasion for Peter in the only line in which he will be useful to you, I shall be very glad to keep him, as well on acct. of my jackass, stud-horses, mares, &c., as because he seems unwilling to part with his wife and children.

"When you are in this way (and if it is not more profitable to you than it is to me you had better keep out of it) he may be serviceable, but hardly in any other, as he will do nothing but peddle about the stables, & conceives it to be a kind of degradation to bestow his attention on horses of plebeian (sic) birth.

"With great esteem & regret I am, Dear Sir, yr. obed. and affect. Ser.

"G. WASHINGTON."

There are people in the world whose lives are a scheme. A scheme, mind, not a plan. It is a good thing to form a plan of life, squared by the dictates of prudence and common sense, and to live squarely up to it; but it is a bad thing to concoct a plot against society for the advantage and aggrandizement of self, without reference to the rights, feelings and interests of others. There is cunning, and what some people call shrewdness, in this sort of strategy, but it does not pay, however successful it may be as a pecuniary speculation. The man who practices it can have no friends, and it is a terrible thing to live and die unloved, an object of general distrust and hatred. Many who are called fortunate men, owe their acquisitions solely to a species of trickery and fraud, which is not the less rascally because it is so ingeniously contrived as to avoid the penalties of the law. Call it smartness, acuteness, or what you will, there is no name that can make it smell sweet in the nostrils of honest men.

Trained Nurses.

The regulation charge of first-class professional nurses in New York is $21 a week, and they are in demand at that price. The engagement of a thoroughly trained nurse is considered by physicians as half the battle against disease won. The high wages earned has brought into the profession large numbers of women who have been well bred and delicately reared, but who have been unfortunate in losing their means of support. They are as particular in choosing their places of service as patients are in choosing them.

In talking with such a nurse a few days ago she said to the New York Press man: "I always want to know that I am going where I will be well treated—that is, not as a servant, but as the peer of any member of the household. I feel that I occupy a confidential relation to the household, not second even to that of the family physician. I do not consider any labor that I may be called upon in my capacity as nurse to perform as menial. It is the labor of necessity which many perform through love, but which I undertake as a professional duty."

The Masculine Girl.

Periodically boyish fashions in woman's dress become popular, and the masculine shirt bosom, the most uncompromisingly ugly part of man's attire, is adopted for a time. Such fashions do not usually last long, because they are essentially unlovely. The period of the derby hat was so short that it was abandoned by refined women almost as soon as it was introduced.

For some reason the present epidemic of masculinity in dress has been unusually violent—probably because it was first foisted upon a refined public by English tailors, by methods which brought undue and valuable prominence to certain London tradesmen. The latest phase of the craze for masculine styles, says the New York Tribune, is to be noted in the new parasols, mounted upon heavy club sticks like the unwieldy walking canes affected recently by young gentlemen who adopt English styles.

Secretary Johnson, of the American Copyright League, sends the New York Critic the following extract from a letter he has received from Mrs. Elizabeth W. Bellamy. The Congressmen who oppose international copyright are beset with the same queer twist that obscured the morals of my old Mammy Phillis, a good old slave, who occupied a position of implicit trust in my grandmother's household. She had an especial capacity for nursing the sick, and on one occasion my grandmother sent her to a friend to attend upon his little invalid daughter. Mammy was delighted to go, and my grandmother's friend and all his people were delighted to have her; they could not say too much in her praise. But in an evil hour, in spite of the gifts lavished upon her, she succumbed to temptation, and appropriated to her own use several articles of jewelry and some loose cash. My grandmother was horrified. "Phillis," said the old lady, "I would as soon have suspected one of my own children of theft as you, who never stole the value of a pin from me or mine." "Dullaw, ole Miss, what you gwan fret yo' soul 'bout trifles for?" said Phillis. "Hit ain't no loss o' yourn, honey. In cose I ain't niver stole from you nur de fam'ly; I holds myself above sich low down thievery as dat, which it is actual stealin'. But outsiders o' de fam'ly is a different case, an' what o' theirn comes to my benefit, I tell you fur a fact, ole Miss, hit's my opinion, de Lawd, He winks at sich a convenience as dat."

Seeing Bishop Potter and Colonel Higginson together on the Sanders Theater platform on Thursday, both wearing the pink and blue ribbons which Phi Beta Kappa men so highly prize, the pencil was reminded of a story which the bishop loves to tell as an illustration of Colonel Higginson's practical experience of politics.

When Colonel Higginson was running for Congress two years ago, the Bishop says, a friend of his, a gentleman living in Cambridge, visited the polls election day to see how the colored vote was going. In one of the ward rooms he met a colored man who had formerly been in his employ, and going up to him he asked:

"Well, George, how is your favorite candidate to-day?"

The colored brother named the man for whom he was going to vote, and, to the grief of his former employer, it was not the name of Colonel Higginson that he gave.

"You don't mean to say, George," said the Colonel's friend, "that you are going to vote that way! Why, I should think that your sense of honor and of gratitude would lead you to cast your ballot for a man who has done so much as Colonel Higginson has for you and all the people of your race."

But the colored brother had different ideas. "I should think, sah," he replied, "dat my sense ob honor and ob gratitude would lead me to vote for de genman what guv me $2 50 dis mornin'."

The story is told of a German, who took the hands of his clock to the maker to have them fixed, because they did not keep proper time. Of course, the clock-maker demanded the works, as in them lay the trouble. Boils and blotches, pimples and other eruptions on the exterior tell of a disordered condition of the blood within. If you have these indications, be wise in time, and take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It puts the liver and kidneys in good working order, purifies the blood, cleanses the system from all impurities, from whatever cause arising, and tones up the functions generally.

"Golden Medical Discovery" checks the frightful inroads of Scrofula, and, if taken in time, arrests the march of Consumption of the Lungs (which is Lung-scorfula), purifies and enriches the blood, thereby curing all Skin and Scalp Diseases, Ulcers, Sores, Swellings, and kindred ailments. It is powerfully tonic as well as alterative, or blood-cleansing, in its effects, hence it strengthens the system and restores vitality, thereby dispelling all those languid, "tired feelings" experienced by the debilitated. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetters, Salt-rheum, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands.

"Golden Medical Discovery" is the only blood and lung remedy, sold by druggists, and guaranteed by its manufacturers, to do all that it is claimed to accomplish, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County.

The people of the State of California, To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting: You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, July 9, 1890.
JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. GETT, JR.
Attorney for Petitioner.

FROM SIG. MARTINEZ, CONCERT SOLO PIANIST.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business

A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

Toughness of conscience, according to The Century, is very often an element of worldly success. This is a pretty hard rub at the present constitution of society, but when we look about us and ascertain the character and standing of some of our successful men, we are constrained to agree with The Century, that the lack of conscience is a means of success, however we may prate about honesty being the best policy. There is much in the affairs of men that produces a success without the aid of conscience. In other words, a man who is conscienceless will reap a harvest while the conscientious man will fail. It is the old saying—get money—honestly if you can, but get money. Accomplish your political ends—honestly if you can, but if not, then let conscience be relegated to the darkness. We all know men who have succeeded in gaining great political prominence, who accomplished this end through an absolute lack of any conscience whatever. Others within our knowledge have acquired the distinction wealth gives by a lack of conscience. It is a pretty tough admission to make, that in a majority of worldly successes, we find the absence of conscience in attaining the same. The unscrupulous man succeeds where the honest conscientious fellow will fail. In politics this is demonstrated more than in any other walk of life. We quote from Century: "The principle is true in ordinary business; it is true in politics; it is particularly true in the journalistic world. It is a harder task, it requires more genuine ability and greater 'staying power,' to reap worldly success in this field scrupulously than unscrupulously. The fact is that there is altogether too much reverence for rascals, and for rascally methods, on the part of tolerably decent people. Rascality is picturesque, doubtless, and in fiction it has even its moral uses; but in real life it should have no toleration; and it is, as a matter of fact, seldom accompanied by the ability that it brags.

The Huntington campaign inaugurated in this county has been but a comedy of errors, and at this stage of the matter we must but express sympathy for those who were so foolish as to engage in it. We fully appreciate that the people of this county are intelligent, yet we have known very conscientious men of this city to have been deceived and betrayed. Of this matter of the disruption of the Republican party in this county, we can say with pleasure it has been defeated. Mr. Huntington chose instruments to accomplish his purpose who did not enjoy public confidence. It is to us, however, not a matter of wonder, for Huntington has a god—it is stamped upon the currency of this country; he clings to his almighty. The history of the situation of politics in this county at this time can be told in a single article. Senator Stanford had been for years the President of the railroad company. Huntington made an unfortunate marriage and his wife was not received in society. Huntington should not forget that so sturdy and unbending man as Andrew Jackson could not enforce social equality where taint existed. In that case the wife of the Secretary of War, an esteemed friend of the President, was refused social recognition by the wives of the Federal ministry. She had the support of the President of the United States; it resulted, however, in the dissolution of the Cabinet.

While admiration will be accorded to President Jackson for his firmness in the defense of a woman, tainted as she was, the action of the retiring members must be commended. In the present matter, as we understand it, Senator Stanford and wife refuse to receive one whom they believe to be their social inferior; it resulted in a lukewarmness between two of the principal owners of the Southern Pacific Company. In the interest of harmony Senator Stanford permitted Huntington to become President of the corporation, but in the worst of faith the newly elected president delivered a speech condemnatory of the administration of his predecessor and furnished copies to the press. Throughout all these transactions Senator Stanford has maintained a dignified silence. Huntington showed his hand immediately in this county and soon found men who were willing to kick at what was presumed to be a dead lion. The first movement was a letter from a distinguished lawyer, the design of which was to intimidate those employed by the company here. Then followed the establishment of a secret political club which has made itself noted, not so much by the number of its membership, as by the profuseness of its manifestos. It is significant that many of the members of this club have already withdrawn and it is safe to say its articles of incorporation will not be filed. We have a list of its originators; there are some names of individuals upon it of persons whose social and political careers will not bear a scrutiny they will be satisfied with. Of course any intelligent man can see this club will drop from the weighting it has. Following the organization of this club came the issuance of an anonymous circular directed against gentlemen holding prominent official positions in this county. It fell, of course, flat. Then there came threatening notes directed to gentlemen in the employ of the company. We presume the persons who are sought to be intimidated understand the import; we know those who caused the issuance of these notes misjudged the character of the men they sought to menace.

The politics of this county has been and is peculiar. Two years ago the writer of these lines was the Chairman of the Republican County Central Committee, and there then existed what was known as the committee of twenty-six. The latter committee represented an organization that had been formed to purify the politics of this city and county, and among its membership were very many conscientious men. Circumstances did occur that brought about their betrayal, and we will now explain the manner of its accomplishment, and why it came about that the resolutions were introduced in the last county convention that have been so prominent of late. A meeting was held in the office of the Record-Union, then under a different management than the present. There were present the Chairman of the Republican Committee, who now writes, a member of the committee of twenty-six, and the then manager of that paper; and the proposition was there made, that if the Republican Committee would appoint delegates direct to the State Convention, that was to elect delegates to the National Convention to select the nominees for President and Vice-President of the United States, it would be protected, and that its action would be endorsed by the committee of twenty-six, and by the manager of the journal spoken of. It was represented to the writer that such action would be satisfactory to the party, and against his judgment he was weak enough to acquiesce. What was the result? The Republican Committee did appoint these delegates, and among them was the lawyer who was of the committee of twenty-six. Immediately after the adjournment of the Republican County Central Committee, a meeting of the committee of twenty-six was had, and a resolution was passed condemning the action of the Republican Committee. We were informed it was introduced by the member of that committee who advised us to pursue the course we did, and immediately following appeared an anonymous card, impugning our motives. We discovered we had been the victim of treachery, and that deception had been exercised both against the committee of twenty-six and the Republican County Committee. Another meeting of the Republican Committee was called, and several gentlemen of the committee of twenty-six were present—one was conspicuously absent. It will be recollected by those who were present that the presiding officer, with considerable bitterness, stated to the committee of twenty-six, that they had traitors in their camp and that they had been betrayed. Action had too far gone that change could be made, and in view of an impending campaign silence had to prevail. However it was, we caused to be introduced and passed by the Republican Convention the resolutions that have been so much commented upon recently, and the first of the series provides: "That in all instances where delegates are to be selected to State or County Conventions, they shall be selected at primary elections." It seems strange that two years afterward the same parties who betrayed the committee of twenty-six and the Republican Committee, should be heading a movement based upon these very resolutions, to disrupt the Republican party in the county. We could speak much more in detail of this and other matters political that are within our knowledge, and will if occasion requires. We fully realize the infamy of the scheme that has been inaugurated in this county to defeat Senator Stanford, and have an intimate knowledge of the careers of the men who head it. The public know there are some in the lead who are extremely vulnerable, and it cannot be expected they will be permitted to degrade a gentleman of the character of Senator Stanford, in this community, without encountering opposition from his many friends.

It may be laid down as an inflexible rule of the great majority of modern journals, that the whole, the absolute truth in any matter of a political or sensational nature is entirely out of the question. The modern sensational journal will not tell the whole truth, when the real facts might destroy the sensational character of an article. The political party journal abstains studiously from the truth, when the truth might benefit an adversary. A miserable selfishness controls the columns of the modern journal. The so-called live journal would prefer to blast the character of some individual than to devote a line of praise for just merit. "The masses read scandal," says the live paper, "when the common news of the day is passed unread." We fear there is much truth in this proposition, and it is with this regard the live journal inspires its selfish propensities, at the cost of truth, at the ruin of character. With a slight basis of apparent fact, the rapacious newspaper scandal monger will construct a pure fabrication, which may bring ruin and destruction to the innocent and pure; yet there may be the color of fact in the subject, which if presented in honesty and truth would disclose the want of foundation for anything wrong. Public officers are the targets for the keenest shafts of calumny. No matter how faithful they may be to their trusts, there are newspapers which never lose an opportunity to blacken their characters and impugn the most honest purposes. This desire to drag down is not confined to political partisan journals, but seems to pervade the "live" journal of any and all political party casts. With this class of newspapers it is impossible to tell the whole truth; downright lying is altogether preferable. Some board or authority makes a casual suggestion that some of the departments under its control might be conducted at less expense; at once the live newspaper jumps at conclusions, and comes out with conspicuous headlines: "Reckless Extravagance!" "Public Money Squandered!" "A Public Servant Who Has Betrayed His Trust!" when, in truth and in fact, there is not the most remote foundation for any complaint, or the slightest dereliction of duty. The people read these sensational articles, and are often deceived into the belief that their public servants are thieves. It is a means of educating the unthinking masses into distrust of all public officials. Among the thousands of alleged "discrepancies" discovered by the live newspaper, how very few ever materialize into anything like facts. Here, again, the vicious paper returns to the charge by crying out, after the investigations disclose the lack of any foundation for these accusations, that the affair has been "whitewashed." Within the past few months the sensational papers have "unearthed" several of this character of "shortcomings," but only to vanish into thin air when brought under the crucial test of fair investigation. It is easy, and perhaps popular in certain circles, to cry out "corruption and dishonesty." As a rule, the corruptness and dishonesty begins and ends with the "live" journal.

A Plea for Rest.

The season has come when friends and physicians will be advising every man and woman exhausted by overwork to "take out-door exercise." This recommendation is given on the homeopathic principle that work cures work. There is no doubt something in the suggestion that there should be a uniform development of our faculties, and that one of the evils of the day is the exercise of one to the injury of the other.

But we have rather too much of the suggestion that the remedy for overwork in one direction is exercise in another. Rest is just as desirable as recreation, and much better results would follow did those who are utterly worn out resort not to walking, riding, running, bathing, but to absolute rest at home in bed.

The American people evidently consider idleness the unpardonable sin. The first question they ask about a stranger is: "What does he do?" If they are told that he does nothing, he is at once assigned to a low moral grade. He is looked upon as a cucumber of the ground, a man who is living off the labors of some one else. It will be a good thing for all of us when there is a class in the community content to do little or nothing.

The chief end of a man in modern catechism is to add thousands to the thousands he already possesses. It does not matter that his accumulated thousands are more than he can use with benefit to himself or to his family. He must go on accumulating useless wealth, or lose the esteem of his fellow citizens. The result is the American is condemned to perpetual servitude whether he is successful or not.

The physicians despairing of prescriptions, and abandoning medicine, recommended to the overworked, outdoor exercise. The athletic gospel is a popular one just now, and athletic clubs, when they are not too exacting, and the rivalry not too strong, are admirable institutions. But what we need is organization of "Idle Men's Clubs," not men who are idle twelve months in the year, but clubs of rest, clubs that would impose idleness a certain number of weeks, upon every member. Not change of scenery and change of labor—we have them already—but solitary confinement if necessary to secure absolute rest.

It was a wise physician who recommended one of his patients to spend one day of every week in bed whether ill or well. There are business men who are wise enough to keep away from their office one day in each week, in addition to the ordinary Sabbath rest. One of the most successful firms in the east has its business so arranged that one of the three partners is absent one day in the week, with the result that when they are at work they work with vigor, with delight and with success.

At times a man is possessed of superabundant energy, and having tired his mind by application to his business, whatever it may be, he still is physically exhausted, and may be benefitted by long walks or horseback riding, or a row up the river or an hour or two at tenpins.—Courier Journal

Theosophy.

Theosophy is not a religion. Theosophy depends on Mme. Blavatsky no more than electricity depends on Edison; he is simply "one who can see," one scientist among many. One would hardly maintain that man's control of nature's force would be materially affected in the long run by Edison's mistakes or by attacks on Edison's morality. It is believed that the madame is unjustly treated. It is certain that she is misunderstood and maligned, but that may not affect your development or mine; we must obtain our own knowledge—"do our own work." One may become a theosophist almost without observing it—even without knowing the more distinguished theosophical writings or writers. That the tendency is recognizable to an appreciable degree every honest inquirer will readily admit when the signs of this tendency are known.

We indicate a few of the signs: They are theosophically working who believe in making spirit superior to nature's whims, passions, freaks and willful pranks, tempests and inclemencies—and extend their efforts beyond the more material forms of providing for themselves and others. They are theosophic workers whose will resists and controls the manifestations of the sex nature—that force ordinarily wasted in the natural man may be used in controlling, or bringing within control, other forms of nature's force. What may be called great inventions and discoveries are visible results of this working. Above all they are theosophic workers. Who seek to do away with all unfairness. Who would have all business fair, on the square and above board. Who are active in pursuing and unearthing fakes, cheats and humbugs. Who believe in, and seek to promote, the Brotherhood of Man. Who hold that no man should be unjustly oppressed, levied on or victimized. Who hold him bound, who has an honest advantage in the struggle, to use that advantage mercifully.

Where Economy Reigns.

We know nothing of economy in this country. One should visit Paris to see how little people can live on, and how they save money. The owner of twenty-six restaurants in that city feeds 20,000 people a day, and yet all that is left over from his tables would not fill more than one wagon. Even this, however is sold again to the poor and every scrap is eaten. Nothing is wasted. Even the lame horses are killed and eaten. The ordinary French stove is about the size of an ice tank in a Pullman car. Two quarts of coal fill it, and after the fire is started the concern is whirled around the house to warm it. The same stove is used to warm the house and do the cooking with. The coal used by an American in one winter would warm a whole street in Paris.

Food is high in Paris, but it does not cost the people much, because they eat it all and waste nothing. If our American families exercised the same economy, the difference in the price of food would enable them to live on almost nothing.

Some time ago the saving methods of the French country people were described in these columns. These additional facts show that their city people are not behind the others in the matter of cheap living. But does it profit them in the long run? They think so. It has enabled them to pay their war debts to Germany, to sink hundreds of millions in the Panama canal, to buy finery and enjoy life in their own fashion. Perhaps this way of living would not suit Americans in cities and towns, but as a practical study in economy it deserves our attention. We can hardly fail to learn more than one useful lesson from it.—Atlanta Constitution.

M. de la Tude's Pets.

Though the rat can be fierce when called upon to defend its life, there is a softer side to its character which is often brought out by contact with man. Many instances of this could be adduced similar to that of the omnibus conductor's tame rat, which used to mount guard over its master's dinner and fly savagely at any one who ventured to come near it. The animal had been caught during the removal of some hay, and spared because of its piebald coat. It was very attached to its owner's children, and would play about them as merrily as a kitten. On cold nights it slept in its master's bed, nestling as closely to him as a chicken to its mother. In his memoirs, M. de la Tude, a Frenchman, who fell under the displeasure of Mme. de Pompadour in 1749, and was consequently imprisoned in the Bastille and other fortresses for thirty-five years, tells how he alleviated the tedium of his captivity by making companions of some rats. He was much annoyed for years by the rats, which at nightfall swarmed into his cell, hunting about for scraps of food, and sometimes biting his face when he was asleep. They entered by a hole which ventilated his dungeon; it was about two feet above the floor, and under it were two steps on which he used to sit and breathe the fresh air as it entered. While seated there one day he noticed a large rat at the other end of the hole, and threw it a fragment of bread. This was snatched up, and was followed by more pieces until his supply was exhausted. The next day, at the same time, the rat was there again, and by throwing bread crumbs so that they fell nearer and nearer to him the prisoner gradually induced his visitor to approach, until it finally took a piece from his hand. In a few days' time it was so tame that it would sit on his knee, washing its face and eating what scraps were given to it. One day it brought a companion, which became friendly almost at once, and after a little while the two rats took up their permanent residence in the dungeon. They occasionally went out through the hole, generally returning with another rat, and each newcomer made itself at home, until eventually M. de la Tude's cell was peopled by a family of ten of these rodents. He taught them all to recognize the names he gave them, and used to play with them for hours together. They learned from him a number of tricks, and showed quite a spirit of rivalry in the way they went through their performances.—The Cornhill Magazine.

The English Pitmen.

At 2 o'clock the men of the afternoon shift call for their lamps, 600 of which, lighted, locked, and numbered, stand ready round the lamp-house walls. As they troop up to the window, shouting their numbers, some idea may be formed of the main element in the community. The first thing which strikes a stranger is that colliers have no youth. There are young boys with round, merry faces, but there are no youths. They seem to become men suddenly, with deep lines about the brow and mouth which suggest the idea of nervous overstrain. Their voices, too, are harsh and irritable. No doubt the strained look may be due in part to the long hours of work in a dim, imperfect light; but the same appearance may be noted on the faces of most of the workmen in Northern industrial communities where payment is by piece work, and not by a weekly wage. If the collier loses his youth he is not compensated by length of years. Very few old men are to be seen among them. They break up when still apparently vigorous. Perhaps this is fortunate among a class which does not save, and gives the weekly contributions which might provide an annuity in old age to swell the union funds. But though voice and features show that his work is telling upon him, the collier is far from admitting this to himself. Except in strike times, when it is necessary to appeal to public sympathy, he wants no commiseration for his lot. For the agricultural laborers round him he has a boundless contempt. As a member of an organized body, he has a good many pleasures to which they are strangers. Work over, after an excellent meal, he strolls to his club, there to play bagatelle or billiards, bet on horse races, or hear the news. On Sunday he can go to the handsome church built by the colliery owner, or, if he prefers it, spend an agreeable morning in dog racing or rabbit coursing. These last are very popular amusements, as they afford plenty of scope for betting and gambling, the curse of the North Country industrial villages. Moreover, there is a good cricket ground, which is much patronized on summer evenings. Occasionally a huge excursion is organized to some distant watering place, where the men and their wives sit on the parade or enjoy the novel pleasure of a sail. But mental improvement is difficult in a community where all the members are of one class.—The Spectator.

The First Interviewer.

The life of James Boswell was a series of interviews, and, if interviewers ever had their patron saint, he ought to be beatified for the office. In his time interviewing did not openly avow itself as such. It was performed under difficulties which will make the present practitioners of the art smile. Gen Paoli, (of Corsica) who little knew that he was the proto-martyr of the interviewing persecution, described the process to Fanny Burney in terms which we may be allowed to quote here in order to show to its present professors how rude the art was in its first beginnings, and how vast the progress is which has since been made: "He (Boswell) came to my country, and he fetched me some letters of recommending him; but I was in the belief that he might be an impostor, and I supposed in my mind that he was an spy; for I look away from him, and in a moment I look to him again, and I behold his tablets. Oh! he was to the work of writing down all I say. Indeed, I was angry. But soon I discover he was no impostor and no spy; and I only find I was myself the monster he had come to discern." The interviewing reporter or special correspondent, as we believe we ought to call him—for the class stands very much on its dignity, and a correspondent is a very different sort of person from a reporter—now presents himself quite at his ease, notebook and pencil in hand, when the pencil is not between his teeth, and sets about his work openly and with elaborate arrangement.—The Saturday Review.

That is not Swearing.

"You need not have looked severe because I said that I didn't care a dam," said a gruff old senator in conversation with the Sunday school reporter of the Washington Star. "That is not swearing. The expression has a very different meaning from what is popularly supposed, and was originated by the Duke of Wellington. A dam in India is the smallest piece of money known, and not to care that much means simply that one is very indifferent. That was all the phrase was intended to signify. The word 'damn' from the Latin verb meaning 'to condemn,' is a very different thing. Curiously enough, it seems almost invariably to be the first word in our language acquired by foreigners, and it has always been such a favorite with the English that in the last century the French always refer to them as the 'Goddams.' A distinguished Gallic writer of that epoch said that English was a beautiful tongue, and that 'Goddam' was the basis of it. 'People of that nation,' he remarked, 'have a few other words which they use in conversation, but the principal one is 'Goddam.' You can go anywhere in England if you know that.'

"A funny misapprehension also exists as to the expression, 'Go to the deuce.' People generally suppose that 'deuce' means 'devil,' whereas, as a matter of fact, it is derived directly from the Latin 'Deus'—'God.' So when any one tells you to go to the deuce he is unconsciously uttering the best of good wishes for your welfare.

"Speaking of Latin, reminds me that among the ancient Romans it was considered the thing of each man to have some particular god to habitually swear by. Some swore by Jupiter, others by Mars, others still by Minerva, and so on. The demi-gods, like Hercules and Castor and Pollux, were also made use of in the way of oaths. Castor and Pollux were usually appealed to as the 'Twins'—'By Gemini!'—the phrase whence we get our exclamation, 'By Jiminy!' It was thought very improper for Roman ladies to swear by the male gods, but they were permitted to take the names of the Twins in vain, and also especially that of Venus. In moments of great aggravation they might go so far as to cry, 'Mecastor!'—'By Castor!' The Greeks swore by the cabbage, which was the most prized of vegetables, and even to this day the same oath is often heard in Italy, while in France a lover is being immensely affectionate when he calls the lady of his heart his 'petit chou,' or 'little cabbage.' 'By jingo' is far from 'Jinco,' the Basque name for God. Barbarous tribes have been accustomed to swear by the head of their ruler. Queen Elizabeth is said to have been a very hard swearer, as ladies were apt to be in her day. Louis IX, of France, forbade the use by his courtiers of such oaths as 'Pardieu,' 'Cordieu,' 'Tetedieu,' and so on. There chanced to belong to one of the ladies of the court a small dog named 'Bleu.' The courtiers made up their minds to swear by the dog instead of by the Deity, and hence came the parbleus and corbleus of later times. Pythagoras had a favorite oath which most people would consider not sufficiently forcible to be satisfactory. He swore by the number four, which the Greeks regarded as symbolizing perfection."

The Stage.

George F. Marion will be the Jonah in A Brass Monkey next season.

Gus. Williams and John T. Kelly will star next season in a new comedy called You and I.

Carrie Lamont, a soubrette, who has made a favorable impression among the theater-goers of the West, will star the forthcoming season in a play called La Cigale, and be seen at some theater here in the spring. Rita Booth, the only daughter of John Wilkes Booth, will be a member of her company.

"The present difference between Gilbert and Sullivan is not the first," says Figaro, "for after the production of Thespis, or the Gods Grown Older, Mr. Gilbert wrote Princess Toto to music by the late Frederic Clay, and Sir Arthur Sullivan composed the music of the Zoo to a libretto by Mr. B. C. Stephenson. This, however, did not prevent Sullivan and Gilbert from coming together again in the same year with Trial by Jury, and afterward with The Sorcerer, inaugurating the series of comic operas which have delighted successive audiences during the past 12 years."

"I can never forget an incident that happened in Hanover, Germany, in which a New York friend of mine and myself were the principal actors," said Arnold Heap to a Chicago Post reporter. "After my college days, in 1876, I went to Germany to study the German language. I was accompanied by this New York friend. Every year there are played some of Schiller's dramas to keep the memory of the great German poet and dramatist fresh in the minds of the people. Schiller's dramas all represent liberty of some kind. Well, one evening my friend and I attended the theater where a Schiller drama was being performed. It was a Schiller anniversary, and the house was crowded. Neither of us understood German, and you may imagine that the play was not so absorbingly interesting to us as it might have been if we had known something more of the mother tongue. But we sat there undemonstrative and attentive. Of course we were more or less interested in the play because the surroundings were new and strange to us. Suddenly the actor impersonating the leading role spoke in reciting his lines the name of George Washington. It was a familiar name and it went home. It appealed forcibly to our spirit as Americans. So soon as that name was uttered by the actor the two undemonstrative young spectators were transformed into yelling and stamping beings. We shouted and clapped our hands and stamped our feet until we were exhausted. Of course the audience was electrified. No one else applauded but ourselves, because there was nothing in the speech that called for special recognition from the spectators. You can imagine how we were stared at. The theater officials looked after us as if we were some dangerous characters. I have no doubt that they took us to be two escaped lunatics. But we couldn't help it.

"A Daughter of Silence" is the title of Edgar Fawcett's last novel.

There are now in America seventy-five colleges for women, and the number is yearly increasing.

A firm of Italian publishers is bringing out an edition of Hawthorne's works in Italian. How Hawthorne would have enjoyed the thought of having his "Marble Faun" read by sympathetic Italians in their own musical tongue.

I know a young woman in New York, the daughter of a well known editor, whose marvellous memory is literally her fortune, says a writer in the Epoch. She is an omnivorous reader. No book escapes her, and, once read, is never forgotten. This extraordinary girl is as familiar with the literature of past ages as with the two-penny novels of to-day, and is employed by one of the leading publishers for the sole purpose of reading manuscript and pronouncing upon its originality. Not only borrowed plots, but borrowed styles, borrowed phrases, are instantly detected, and their original source is noted down. She occupies a position which is unique in the history of great publishing houses. She is the real Nemesis of the plagiarist.

There was a great sale of books recently in London, the library of the late Sir Edward Sullivan. The library was a remarkable one, ranging from the early editiones principes of the classics all through the publications of modern English and French literature down to the works of Emile Zola. There was an almost complete collection (with the counterfeits) of the varied productions of Aldin Manutius and of Louis Elzevir. Many of the finest editions came from the celebrated Sunderland library, sold some years ago by the Duke of Marlborough; others from the Hamilton palace library. A Plato (princeps editio, 1513) bears the autograph signature of Kenelin Digby. There is an Aristophanis Comediarum (Aldus, 1493), bound by Dura; an Aristotia (Paris, 1554), bears the coat of arms of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; the first edition of the Hecatomithi of Gyraldi Cinthio (1565), from which Skakspeare took his Othello; a Shakspeare folio of 1626, and first editions galore of Byron, Browning, Carlyle, Coleridge, De Quincey, Dickens, Eliot, Keats, Fielding, Goldsmith, Shelley, Ruskin, Scott, Thackeray, Tennyson, etc. In fact, the wealth of rarities is simply bewildering.

The Science of Medicine.—"I know exactly now what you must do to recover your health. You must drink every morning two cups of very strong tea." "But, Doctor, I have done that always for ever so many years." "Oh, is that so? Then leave it off."

The wife of one of New York's best known editors has a novel way of discovering what time he gets home in the morning. Of course, the business of the editor keeps him down town late at night, and it is only to be expected that he will arrive at home long after the family has gone to sleep, but Mrs. Editor declares that he remains out frequently long after his work at the desk is done. The milkman, she says, leaves several cans of milk at the doorway every morning at day-break. When the husband gets home by daylight he invariably drinks the cream that has risen on the milk. She examines the cans every morning to find out whether her husband had been keeping late hours.

It is perhaps not generally known that, when he was a young man, Bismarck had a quasi-connection with the profession of journalism, for he was for quite a time an official reporter for one of the courts of justice. In those days his temper sometimes got the better of him; but upon one occasion, at least, his wit saved him from disgrace. This was when, questioning a witness, the latter made an impudent retort, whereupon Bismarck exclaimed angrily: "If you are not more respectful I shall kick you out of the room." "Young man," said the judge, interrupting the proceedings, "I would have you understand that this is a dignified court of justice, and that if there is any kicking to be done the court will do it." "Aha, you see?" said Bismarck to the witness. "If you are not more respectful to me the court will kick you out of the room—so be careful, very careful, sir!"

An old lawyer of distinction delighted to tell the following story: "Many years ago I was defending a prisoner for horse stealing, and seeing no other means of defending him in the circumstances, I set up the plea of insanity. I argued it at length, read many extracts from works on medical jurisprudence, and had the patient attention of the court. The prosecuting counsel did not attempt to reply to my argument or controvert my authorities. I seemed to have things my own way, and whispered to the prisoner that he needn't be uneasy. Then came the judge's charge, in which he reminded the jury there was no dispute between counsel as to the facts of the case. Indeed, there could not have been, for several witnesses had sworn positively that they saw my client steal the horse. "But," concluded the court, "the plea of insanity has been set up, and I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that it should receive your very grave and serious deliberation. But I must be allowed to say, gentlemen, that, upon a review of the whole case, I can discover no evidence of insanity on the part of the prisoner, except perhaps in the selection of his counsel."

Years ago—thirty-five or more—Timothy O. Howe, who was afterward Postmaster General of the United States, was traveling up the Fox river, of Wisconsin, in a scow. In a corner of the boat he stumbled across a short, thick-set young man who was reading a big calf-bound book. The young man was dressed like a lumberman, in a hickory shirt, and with his corduroy breeches tucked in long, thick-soled boots. Mr. Howe paused in wonderment at the contrast between the book and the dress. "What are you reading there, young man?" he asked. The young man turned up the volume, and the astonished Mr. Howe read "Tacitus." It was many years before the two men met again in Washington, and then Mr. Howe was high in the government and Thomas Witherell Palmer was a candidate for Senator from Michigan. But Mr. Howe remembered the lumberman in the risen and rising politician, and he said he didn't wonder. This is the sort of man who has taken the presidency of the Columbian Exposition Commissioners. The lad who could read "Tacitus" on a Fox river scow is not likely to lose his studiousness in later years, and Senator Palmer can still read "Tacitus" and more with pleasure. He is a traveler, a man familiar with nations and their tongues, and he is a diplomat.

While the Germans were laying siege to Paris about twenty years ago, M. Thiers came out of the city to consult with Bismarck about the proposed capitulation. Of course it was the Frenchman's duty to present a cheerful front, and to seek to convey the impression that things were not in so desperate a condition in Paris as the besiegers might suppose. On the other hand, Bismarck was pretty well satisfied that the besieged Parisians were being starved out, but of course he intimated no such thing in the presence of M. Thiers. But, after the conference, Bismarck invited M. Thiers to dinner, and the Frenchman only too gaily accepted the invitation. Then it was that the wily German noticed that M. Thiers ate voraciously of the vegetables and breads, rejected the canned and pickled foods, and partook with seeming avidity of the fresh meat. This confirmed Bismarck's suspicions—Paris was starving. After M. Thiers went back into the city there was found in the lavatory adjoining the apartment assigned to him at Bismarck's headquarters, part of a Paris newspaper, and from certain items in this bit of newspaper, it was learned that the condition of things in Paris was even more desperate than had been supposed. After the retirement of the Germans from French soil, Bismarck tarried for some time at Stuttgart, and hither came M. Jules Ferry, to conclude the terms of permanent peace. The conference was a protracted one, and at times the discussion was stormy, if not violent. At one time Bismarck quite lost his temper, and began to express himself in robust German. "Pardon me," said M. Jules Ferry, "but you are now speaking in German, and I do not understand you." "That is true," retorted Bismarck, "but so long as I spoke French you insisted upon misunderstanding me, and I prefer a language you cannot understand to one that you will misunderstand." This sally produced a laugh, and good nature was speedily restored.

NOTES.

During the sweltering heat of Tuesday, in St. Louis, Mo., a parrot in a cage outside of a drug store halted a passer-by with: "Say, is this hot enough for you?" The pedestrian immediately drew a revolver and shot the unoffending bird dead. If every one in Sacramento who uses that senseless phrase was shot to death, the town would be depopulated.

It now transpires that the "nickel in the slot machine" is not an institution of modern civilization. It is as old as Egyptian history. In the temples of Egypt devices of this kind were employed for automatically dispensing the purifying water. A coin of five drachmae dropped into a slot in a vase set a simple piece of mechanism, like a well sweep, in motion; a valve was opened for an instant, and a portion of the water permitted to escape. This apparatus was described by Hero of Alexandria, who lived two hundred years before the Christian era. There is, indeed, nothing new under the sun.

Last week we called attention to the importance of the next Legislature to this city and county. Only men of the first ability, experience, influence, and activity should be sent to the Legislature this year. We have too much at stake to gratify the personal ambition of any man or men. Ten years ago, when the legislative apportionment was made, we lost one Senator and two Assemblymen. We want to recover our loss this year, and only bright, energetic, and experienced representatives can accomplish this result. See to it, members of the Republican Convention, that the right men are sent to the Assembly. Our local interests, besides, demand the services of men familiar with our needs.

It is astonishing what men will do in politics. Principle, honor, friendship is sacrificed on the political altar for the spoils of office. A personal and selfish element permeates men engaged in political party strife. Worthy men are pushed aside by the unscrupulous for the unscrupulous. We prate about our boasted liberties, where the majorities rule. It is not the majority, but the conscienceless and unscrupulous that overcome the majority. Just before every important election an agitation is aroused for reforms in the "unfortunates" and "gamblers." Reading the petition for the removal of questionable characters from a certain street snacks a little of one of these periodical spasmodic virtuous streaks. If a cleansing of the Augean stables is necessary—the purification of the waters of Jericho demanded—then let the Herculean labors be complete, and applied to all portions of the city, not a single locality. If reforms must be enforced, let the order cover all offending spots.

Hon. Newton Booth, ex-Governor and ex-United States Senator, has just returned from a year and a half tour of the Old World. The "Governor," as he is familiarly called by all Sacramentoans, looks hale and hearty. The trip through Europe has added to the great store of knowledge already possessed by our distinguished townsman. While looking over the political situation, and recalling the events of Newton Booth's brilliant campaigns, reference being made thereto in an article taken from the Argonaut in this issue, we cannot repress the thought and wish that he might be induced to enter the list and bear the Republican standard to victory. The eloquence of Booth on the stump would insure success to our cause, and make it very realistic that Colis P. Huntington is out of politics—out of politics because the voice of the people would crush him in his duplicity and hypocrisy. We ask—Why not Hon. Newton Booth for standard bearer?

Sitting in a down town barber shop where a number of young colored people congregate in their "off" hours, we often hear quaint ideas and notions expressed. "Wow," said a sharp witted bootblack, "Just think of it. This morn' in I saw comin' down the street a big black coon, and it's Monday, and hadn't done a shine. Wow, but it was bad luck, so I cut sticks 'round the corner so not to meet the coon." The interpretation of this is a superstition among colored people, that if you meet a "coon," as they term it, on Monday morning before you earn anything, it is bad luck, and you will not earn anything all week.

Another barbers' superstition is that all the hair dropped in the course of the day from patrons, must be carefully swept up in a pile and carried out of the shop, and either buried or deposited where it cannot be burned. To burn or cause to be burned human hair brings sore mental, and often physical affection on the one who desecrates this barbers' law. No hair or dirt from a barber's shop must be swept beyond the threshold. At this point it must be taken up and carried out of the shop. A transgression of this rule brings misfortune.

A colored barber is exceedingly superstitious about shaving anyone the first thing on Monday morning unless he receives his pay. No matter how good or responsible his patron, if he gets out of the chair without paying, he creates in the barber a feeling of deep despair. There will be no business or luck for him during the week.

The citizens of 4½ Ward are inclined to resist the enforcement of toll. Nobody ever did take kindly to toll in any shape. This political toll will die out in a knell this afternoon. Fourth warders won't tolerate this little toll attempted to be fastened upon them. Toll the bells, Fire Commissioner Howard.

THE CONSPIRACY.

A View from Abroad—The Estimate of the Argonaut of the Situation Here.

The following was published in the Argonaut, of San Francisco, last Saturday:

We learn from THEMIS, a weekly journal published at Sacramento, that a correspondence has taken place between Grove L. Johnson, formerly a Senator from Sacramento, and President Huntington, of the Southern Pacific Company, in reference to the duty of employees in the company's shops to abstain from interference in politics. Mr. Huntington is intent upon preventing the mechanics and workmen in the company's employ from using their influence to assist Governor Stanford to be returned to the United States Senate. We wish Mr. Huntington would abstain from intermeddling in the affairs of the Republican party, and leave Governor Stanford and the Republicans of California to determine the election of a United States Senator in accordance with party usages. While we are unreservedly in favor of the election of Governor Stanford to a second senatorial term, we do not remember to have taken issue with the newly elected President of the company for any honest effort he has made to withdraw the railroad company from endeavoring to control and direct the politics of the State. We have not approved of the employment of any politicians—Graham, Carr, Stow, Sargent, Higgins, or anybody else—to manage party affairs or control party conventions. To the extent that the railroad company has been compelled to fight upon the defensive in order to protect itself from spoliation, we have sympathized with it. We have seen it unjustly assailed on every side and compelled to stand upon the defensive in the halls of Congress, in the lobbies of State Legislatures, and in the Boards of Supervisors of every county through which it has passed. Sometimes we have thought the company right and sometimes we have thought it wrong. But we have always deprecated the necessity of employing professional politicians to stand between it and harm. We have been of the opinion that if the company had depended upon the public and its representatives, and had made no political organization in its defense, it would have saved money, trouble, and unending annoyance. So when Mr. Huntington asserted the position that the company should not act in its corporate capacity politically, we were glad of it. We never have believed that Governor Stanford expended any money to secure his election to the Senate of the United States and he was never as active to elect himself as was Mr. Huntington to elect Mr. Sargent. We have been informed that money has been used in Washington to secure political results, but we have been informed and have believed that Mr. Huntington was the active disbursing agent and that more money had been expended in Washington than in California, Oregon and Nevada. We have understood that Mr. Huntington took a very active part in the campaign against William A. Piper, and that he caused money to be expended to prevent his reelection to Congress. We thought we had gained this information from Mr. Huntington's correspondence with Mr. D. D. Colton, and if we are correctly informed, Mr. Huntington has for many years played an important part in the management of political affairs of all the railroads before all the legislators, judges, and assessing officials in which they have been concerned. We are quite sure that Governor Stanford is entirely willing to submit his claims to the Legislature of California for reelection if Mr. Huntington will keep his hands entirely free from intermeddling. Nor do we think that it is possible for Governor Stanford to be beaten in this contest, whether Mr. Huntington expends money or refrains from using it, nor whether Mr. Grove L. Johnson does or does not favor the return of Governor Stanford to the United States Senate. We think the people of Sacramento will elect members of the Senate and Legislature favoring his return. Sacramento is a Republican city and county; in it Governor Stanford has spent his active life; there is his home; his neighbors know him, and will, in our judgment, favor his reelection to the Senate of the United States. We would be entirely willing to trust his reelection to the working-classes of California, because with working-men he has had no quarrel. Employing more unchanical, skilled and common laborers than any other individual on the Pacific Coast, he has paid his men better wages than any other corporation. There has never been a strike against any company or any concern over which the Governor has presided or whose interests he has managed. Wherever and whenever there has been any misunderstanding, every laborer knew he could appeal to Governor Stanford with confidence that justice and equity would be measured out to him in kindness and generosity with common sense. On one occasion, some years ago, Mr. Colton undertook to pay off the men in silver, then at a discount. Upon a statement of the case to the President of the corporation, Governor Stanford at once corrected the mistake and paid the men in gold coin. Governor Stanford has always held with his workmen the kindest of relations, has paid them the highest of wages to the extent of his influence, and contended to keep the wages of labor well sustained. We do not doubt that Governor Stanford is the choice of this State for any office to which he may aspire; that office is one he now holds, and is the only one he has sought since in the years 1862-3 he filled the gubernatorial chair. He has filled his senatorial position with honesty, ability and dignity; he has made no ostentatious display of his wealth; he has performed his official duties with industry, and has in all respects made a good Senator. He ought to be returned, and if the decision is left to the intelligent property-owners, mechanics, laboring men, farmers, and toilers, he will undoubtedly be chosen. All the opposition that Governor Stanford will receive will be from other than the working-men of California. The men who will support him will be the fathers who have children to educate, and every stone and arch and column that is piled at Palo Alto, in building the Leland Stanford Jr. University, will counterbalance in weight and influence more than all the Grove L. Johnsons and Collis P. Huntingtons, all the coin and Chronicles, all the piece-clubs and demagogic politicians that money will buy or bribery influence at the polls in November, or in the legislative halls at Sacramento.

A MACHINE WITH BRAINS.

Census Returns Counted with the Aid of Electricity.

Brains do not count for much at present in the Census office, at Washington, as the electrical machines now used there for the purpose of tabulating and counting the return of population are pronounced a success. An idea of the adaptability of the machines can be obtained when it is stated that the average worker in the Census office can now count, with the aid of the machine, about 40,000 names a day, while the clerks in the office during the 1880 census could tabulate only 3,000 or 4,000 names a day.

The counting machine, unlike the average department clerk, never gets tired, never has to lay off a few days each month on account of alleged ailments of the flesh, is just as ready to work sixteen as eight hours a day, and above all it is impossible for it to make a mistake.

Beginning last Monday, the Census office commenced tabulating the population at the rate of 2,500,000 names a day. This could only be done by a regiment of clerks, in the absence of the counting machine, but it might not be as accurate. The machine is the invention of H. Hollerith, who was employed on the last census, and who then became impressed with the necessity of having as much of the work as possible done by machinery.

The plan includes the use of blank record cards of snail size, divided into small squares, to each of which is assigned a particular significance. The age, sex, color, married or single condition, and other information concerning the subject of the inquiry, is first recorded on the card by punching holes in the proper squares. In tabulating this information the electrical counting machine is used. Each card is passed under a press containing a pin for every space upon the card. These pins are held lightly by springs in such a way that when the press descends upon the card they pass through only where holes are already punched, much after the fashion of a Jacquard loom harness.

The pins which pass through the holes connect electric circuits and register on a row of dials the data which the holes in the card are intended to indicate. In this way everything recorded upon the card can be read by the machine and transferred to the dial by a single stroke.

The apparatus can be adjusted to take from the cards any single recorded item or any desired grouping or combination of statistics, or anything upon the card may be tabulated with equal speed and facility. As the counting is done by the machine there is no opportunity for error, nor is there any chance of error in transcribing the records through illegible hand-writing.

The health statistics of New York city are recorded by this method, and the same system is in use in the office of the Surgeon General of the United States army, for compiling the health statistics of the army, month by month.

Census Superintendent Robert P. Porter is gratified at the success thus far attained by the machines. They will enable him to get the population tabulated and counted many months in advance of that of the returns of the 1880 census. The time saved in this way will be of great advantage in hastening the preparation and classification of the reports of the special agents who are engaged in securing statistics of various branches of business. This will be the most tedious and difficult part of the whole census, but Mr. Porter has made many promises that the work will be done more quickly than it was ten years ago.

In comparison with the present systematic manner in which the census is being taken, was the way the census was taken fifty years ago. There was no Superintendent of the census at that time, properly speaking, the work being committed to the Marshals of the several districts of the United States. The enumeration commenced on June 1, 1840, and the law provided that it should be completed and classed within ten calendar months thereafter. The compensation for Assistant Marshal was $2 for every 100 persons up to 3,000, and $2 for every 300 over that number; but extra allowance was stipulated in cases where territory was sparsely inhabited, at the discretion of the Marshals. The schedules were more formidable in the number and variety of questions than those of the present day; but there was no provision for taking names of individuals, except in the case of heads of families and Revolutionary pensioners. A considerable part of the printed schedule was occupied with the department headed "Slaves," and another "Free Colored Persons."

General John C. Fremont.

The death of General Fremont, in New York, this week, removes a remarkable man in his age. So much has been published concerning him that it is not necessary we should particularly refer to the events of his career, but will endeavor only to speak of matters that are not generally known. The father of General Fremont was a Frenchman, and when a passenger on board a ship to the French West Indian possessions, was taken prisoner by an English man-of-war, kept in confinement for several years and subjected to rigorous treatment. After his escape he drifted to Norfolk, Virginia, and there made a living by giving lessons in his native language. He was a man of superior accomplishments and high breeding, and at that place married the daughter of Colonel Thomas Whiting, one of the most beautiful women of her day in Virginia. Col. Whiting's father was a brother of the grand-aunt of George Washington. Col. Whiting, the grand-father of Gen. Fremont, was a wealthy and prominent man. He had been married three times and had fifteen children. The mother of Gen. Fremont was but six months old when her father died, and on the death of her step-mother was taken charge of by her older sister. Litigation ensued regarding the estate of her father, and she found herself penniless before reaching womanhood. She married a Major Pryor, who was forty-five years her senior. The marriage was unfortunate and a divorce followed. Not long afterward she married Fremont, and Pryor, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, married his housekeeper. Fremont, the elder, with his wife, traveled extensively through the country, then largely populated by Indians only. It was during one of these excursions they passed the night in an inn where occurred a personal encounter between Gen. Jackson and Col. Benton, and the balls from the pistols passed through the room in which Fremont and his wife happened to be sitting. In the progress of the same expedition at Savannah, Ga., on January 21, 1813, the wife gave birth to John Charles Fremont, about whose death we now refer.

Young Fremont grew to manhood and adopted the profession of engineering. He fell in love with Jessie, the daughter of Thomas H. Benton, to whom we have made reference, when she was but 15 years of age. His suit was favorably entertained by the daughter, but not by the parents. He eloped with and married her. Afterward, however, Colonel Benton became reconciled to the match.

Fremont left Washington in May, 1842, at the head of a party to explore the territory lying between the Missouri river and the Pacific ocean. Among the persons who accompanied him was the famous Kit Carson. On that expedition he planted the American flag on the highest peak of the Rocky Mountains. He was then instructed to conduct a second exploring expedition, to connect the exploration by land with that being made by Commodore Wilkes, who had charge of the sea exploring expedition. We have never been acquainted with but one man who was a member of this party that accompanied Fremont, and that was Thierry Wright, who lived for many years in this city, and who died at Oakland January 17, 1889. During his lifetime we were very much in company with Mr. Wright, and his narrations of the incidents that happened upon the expedition were extremely interesting. This party came out in 1843. In 1845 Fremont headed another expedition to this country, and in 1846, when near Monterey, received a violent message from General Castro, commanding him to retire from the country. The message was peremptory and rude, and denounced the exploring party as highwaymen and robbers. Fremont refused to obey, and, constructing a fort, prepared to defend his party. For three days they remained in the camp there, and Castro prepared to attack them. Thomas O. Larkin was at that time United States Consul at Monterey. He succeeded in sending a courier to Fremont's camp, and advised him of the situation. Fremont wrote to Larkin that he would defend himself, and that if an unjust attack was made would fight to the extremity, and refuse quarter, trusting to his country to avenge the death of the members of his party. He had raised over his fort the American flag, and we presume that is the flag that has been referred to as the "Bear Flag" in the dispatches within the last three days. As a matter of fact, Fremont had nothing to do with the raising of the "Bear Flag" at Sonoma.

After he left Monterey he proceeded to the north, on his way to Oregon, but was intercepted by a messenger from the war department at Washington of the name of Gillespie. What communication was made to him will, perhaps, never be known. It is only known that the United States Government, in anticipation of a war with Mexico, had stationed a war ship at Mazatlan, and that Gillespie had been dispatched through Mexico to meet Fremont, who was supposed to be in the lower portion of what is now this State. Gillespie was instructed to memorize his dispatch, to destroy the paper before reaching Mexican soil, and to make his communication verbally to Fremont.

It happened that the Mexican Government had arranged with England, that in case of war with the United States the British should take possession of California, and a war ship of that nation, commanded by Admiral Seymour, was lying at Mazatlan, with the understanding that at the first information of hostilities the Mexican Government would notify the British Admiral. It happened, however, that intimation came first to Commodore Sloat, and immediately on its receipt he weighed anchor and sailed for Monterey, raised the American flag over the town, and took possession of California. Shortly afterward the British vessel arrived in that port.

As we say, we can but infer the import of the message delivered to Fremont. He immediately returned, actively participated in the revolution, and the military and naval operations against Mexican power here. On the organization of the State government, Fremont was elected one of the first United States Senators, and in 1856 was nominated for President. In 1864 he again received a Presidential nomination, but practically was not a candidate against Mr. Lincoln. His participation in the Civil war, and his subsequent career, are familiar to the reading public and do not need recapitulation.

Honors to Prof. E. C. Atkinson.

On July 2d, Colby University, at Waterville, Maine, conferred the degree of Master of Arts on Arnold Steadman, of Denver, Colorado, and Edmund Clement Atkinson, of Sacramento, California. It was the 69th commencement of one of the best and oldest colleges in New England, also one of the largest endowed in the United States. There are three academies as "feeders" to the University—one in the western, one in the central, and the other in the eastern part of Maine. The name of the institution was changed in 1867, from "Waterville College" to "Colby University," on account of a munificent gift from the late Gardner Colby, of Mass.

Colby University was Prof. Atkinson's Alma Mater. The good mother has her eye on her children, from the historic Kennebec to the Golden Gate.

A few friends planned a "surprise" for him who had been the recipient of distinguished honors, bestowed on only one other, by the conservative University, chary of her honorary degrees. Monday evening, July 14th, there met at his home, Mayor W. D. Comstock, P. E. Platt, Ira G. Hoitt, C. P. Massey, Prof. Raymond, A. C. Herrick and J. A. Woodson.

An elegant dinner was served, after which Mr. Herrick, a graduate of Colby University, read a message he received from Rev. J. Ricker, D. D., announcing that Edmund Clement Atkinson was honored by his Alma Mater with the degree of A. M. Prof. Raymond, in fitting chosen words, extended "congratulations to our honored friend," unfolding the thought, "merit wins its way." P. E. Platt, in his concise and clear-cut sentences, spoke of the "benefits of the Business College to the city and State." Mayor Comstock, in a heart-touching speech, referred to the twenty years friendship there had been between them, and rejoiced in the honors his friend had worthily won. Mr. Woodson spoke to the sentiment "Our literary friend." It was full of rare thought, in classic style, touched by a vein of sparkling wit.

Mr. Hoitt was glad the "friend of education" was remembered by the University of the "Pine Tree State." It is safe to say Mr. Hoitt never made a better after-dinner speech. Rev. C. P. Massey responded to the thought, "Culture unites the East and the West." It was carefully prepared and elicited applause. Mr. Herrick was asked to speak for his Alma Mater, which he did, and gave congratulations to our hostess, the angel of the home, whose good tact had done so much to give a surprise to him who was the honored friend of the evening. The toast master, Prof. Raymond, then called on the son, Ed. Atkinson, to speak for the dear old mother. Our honored friend, usually so self-possessed and ready of speech, was nearly tongue-tied. But the poets came to his aid, and his words were such as come from a great heart profoundly moved. Thus ended an evening of social, friendly and literary delight, caused by the honors of our Alma Mater, 3,500 miles away.

The Mayor Reproved.

Mayor Comstock is very seriously interfering with the opportunities this journal should have for obtaining political information. On three several occasions lately we had need to interview one of the managers of the "Columbia Club," and it always happened the Mayor would come along, and the statesman whose ear we had would grab his water collection book, leave us abruptly and chase up the street. The Mayor certainly knows that Mr. Cavanaugh has very important duties to attend to. He has to make the pretext, in order to get his $100 a month for relentlessly pursuing the 4,000 delinquent water takers of the city. Then his duties as manager of the club should be considered, because we believe a political club to be as difficult of management as one of the baseball variety.

There are other features about this matter that we do not like. The Mayor is insisting upon pulling down awnings, and laying the stone sidewalks that are so destructive to the eyesight, and yet it is that when the hot weather has come on he is compelling a prominent statesman, physically weak, to walk up and down J street every day carrying a heavy book.

We think if the Mayor will reflect on this matter he will see his course comes nearly being the refinement of cruelty. Besides the hardships we have noted, there are the inviting Buffalo Beer signs out; this hard-worked official nagged about and not permitted to stand on a corner and attend to the interests of his club. It would not surprise us if the "Columbia Club" will direct one of its terrible manifestos against the Mayor, after his treatment of its manager. It seems they have enough of these Papal bulls to issue. Rather, however, than the Mayor shall be so severely punished, we will undertake to induce Major McLaughlin to exercise his war authority and straighten out the Chief Magistrate. We cannot understand why Mayor Comstock should be making the little man with the big book travel up and down J street day in and day out, and not give him a chance to rest, unless it be he wants to make him beat the record of the Wandering Jew.

A Pioneer's Reception.

F. N. Mott, one of the best known members of the Sacramento Society of California Pioneers, and a prominent citizen here, is the owner of a pleasure resort at Seabright, near Santa Cruz, and for many years has spent his summer months there. When he arrived there this season his guests had prepared the hall and arranged a reception for him. They presented him with a magnificent gold-headed cane. The affair was an entire surprise to the gentleman and was extremely happy.

HE WON WEALTH.

The Fortunate Winner of Fifteen Thousand Dollars.

Yesterday the El Paso National Bank paid to Wells, Fargo Express Company $15,000 cash for the lucky holder at Gonzales, Texas, of a quarter of ticket No. 17,303, which won the capital prize in the Juarez lottery drawing last Wednesday. The ticket was sent for collection through the express company, and the money was paid over by Cashier W. H. Austin, who gives a card to that effect in these columns this morning. The Texarkana paper gives these two items:

"Sam Falk is the happiest man in town. He ordered the ticket that drew the $15,000, and if he had just held on to it his bowl of happiness would now be running over."

"Mr. J. Fain, State agent for the El Paso del Norte Lottery Company, came down from Dallas this morning to pay off the prize captured on ticket 17,303. The holder has not been found to this date."

Texarkana captured another quarter of the winning ticket. El Paso's time will come next. An official of the lottery company said yesterday to a Times reporter:

"We are glad Texas has made a winning. But, of course, it is to our interest that the winning tickets are sold in large cities, as a larger number of tickets could be sold in the large cities. Still, we have no control over that, and believe that it will do us just as much good, no matter where drawn, if promptly paid; and we always have money in the El Paso National Bank to pay all winnings by parties in the United States."—El Paso Times.

A CARD.

I, W. H. Austin, Cashier of El Paso National Bank of El Paso, Texas, do hereby certify that quarter ticket No. 17,303, of the Grand Lottery Juarez, was presented by the Wells, Fargo Express Co., and the sum of $15,000 was paid for same to G. N. Dilworth, banker of Gonzales, Texas. This ticket winning one-fourth of the grand prize of $60,000 drawn in drawing of June 25, 1890, of Grand Lottery Juarez, at the Ciudad Juarez, Mexico.

New Riding Habit for Ladies.

"Amelia Grundy," in the London Graphic, says of the new riding habits for ladies, of which she has had a glimpse:

The garments were brought down by a male tailor, who proceeded to exhibit them to me, and shortly afterward a young person connected with the shop entered wearing them. She wore a coat fashioned exactly after the manner of my nephew's frock coat. It fitted her very closely to the waist, opening at the neck over a shirt and tie. The basques or skirt of the coat were somewhat longer and more ample than in the case of a gentleman's garment, but I assure you that that was the only compromise in the matter. The breeches—I believe that is the dreadful name that the other garments go by—were tight to the limbs and buttoned at the knee. High boots and spurs and a tall hat completed the attire, which I can only regard as a shockingly correct copy of what would be worn by one of the other sex. In fact, at a little distance I do not see how you could tell a brother and sister apart.

Cleanliness and Godliness.

One of the most admirable effects of modern philanthropy is the proposal to furnish New York with a big and cheap public bath. The leaders in the movement are Bishop Potter, President Low, of Columbia College, Abram S. Hewitt, Cornelius Vanderbilt and William Astor, and their names are pledges that the money will be forthcoming. The plan is to establish in a thickly settled part of New York a place where a bath can be had at a sum not exceeding seven cents, and where a crowd can be accommodated. It will be built like the baths of ancient Rome, entirely of stone and iron, having immense plunges for men and women, shower and private baths, with entrances for men and women on different streets. The roof will be of vitrified tile, the vaults and ceilings tiled and glazed, the entire structure being fire-proof and costing in the neighborhood of $200,000. A Turkish bath and a laundry, both isolated, are also to be features of the establishment, and the poor will be taught not only that cleanliness is next to godliness but that it is a positive luxury in and of itself.

A Close Call.

The proprietor of the New York Herald, James Gordon Bennett, resides in Europe of late years, making semi-occasional trips across the ocean to look over this valuable newspaper property and to reconstruct the managerial, editorial and working force thereof. These visits are generally unannounced, and therefore unexpected, and, as they usually result in a lively application of the guillotine, are looked forward to with fear and trembling by the employes of the Herald.

For many years "Romeo" had toiled and perspired in the press department of the Herald. He was one of the trusty workers under the elder Bennett, when the now J. G. B. was in his frocklets, yet to him was unknown, and consequently, unappreciated.

"Romeo" was of a genial, social disposition, which at times led him into convivialities beyond his depth, and it was upon the eve of one of these "symposiums," from which our worthy friend had emerged with a suspiciously suggestive discolorment surrounding one of his optics like a halo, that Mr. Bennett appeared upon the scene, as usual, unexpectedly, and as the news spread to every department, "like wild-fire," carrying with it consternation and an uncomfortable feeling about the neck, "Romeo" was terror-stricken, for if Mr. Bennett should discover his black-eye, his summary discharge was certain. But "Romeo" was equal to the occasion, and grasping an inked form roller with his hand he hurriedly, but artistically, drew his hand down over the bad eye, thus completely covering the disfigurement. Mr. Bennett came into the press room and with the superintendent, Mr. John Hays, went carefully through, closely scanning, sometimes commanding and then criticising every detail, looking sharply at each employe as he met them. When seemingly about to leave, and "Romeo" thought he had escaped with his head, he turned suddenly and pointing at "Romeo," said: "Mr. Hays, what is that man's name?" Upon being told he inquired as to his term of service, his general usefulness and conduct, to which the answers were all favorable to "Romeo," when he said: "I want you to give that man $3 per week more wages; he is the only man in the room that looks as if he had been working."—Artist Printer.

The Darwinian and the Herring.

Henrik Dahl, of Aalesund, was a reader and follower of Darwin. Wishing to apply his theory of the limit of adaptability of a species to its environment, he procured a herring from a neighboring fjord and carried it home in a tub of sea water. He renewed the water daily for some time, and gradually reduced the quantity, with so little inconvenience to the herring that he concluded that the fish might, in time, learn to breathe air undiluted with water, like the cat and the man. It turned out as he expected, and the water was finally turned out of the tub, never to be replaced. Henrik next removed the fish from its tub and placed it on the ground, where it flopped about very awkwardly at first, but soon learned to move freely and rapidly. In a little while the herring was able to follow its master without difficulty, and then it became his constant companion about the streets of the city. On a certain unfortunate day Henrik had occasion to cross a dilapidated bridge which spanned an arm of the harbor. The herring coming gracefully along, heedless of danger, now and again springing at the ephemeria, for which it had acquired an especial fondness, missed its footing, slipped through a crack into the water beneath and was drowned.—Forest and Stream.

Humane Hindu Barbers.

The barbers of Bombay have set an example to the trades-unions of Christendom. They have unitedly declared the shaving of the heads of Hindu widows to be an act of oppression, and have agreed that henceforward any barber who performs this operation shall be expelled from his caste. It is true that at the meeting in which this remarkable action was resolved upon, superstition was appealed to in its behalf. It was urged that the barbers had not been prosperous of late years, and that the want of prosperity was the result of the curses of the widows; yet such a superstition as this is itself the result of humane sentiment.

The barbers' action showed that their sense of humanity had triumphed not only over their sense of self-interest, but also over their reverence for the social and religious tradition of their land. The custom of treating widows as outcasts is itself the more humane successor of the custom of condemning them to death at the death of their lord. Even in America it is still believed in some quarters that a woman should have no intellectual life apart from a sympathetic share in that of her husband.

The ancient Hindu custom carried this conception a step further. In order to maintain the unity of man and wife, they sacrificed her physical as well as her intellectual life, except in so far as it ministered to his. It was thought that the wife's whole being should be so wrapped up in that of her husband that she could hope for nothing, not even life itself, without him. When the wives had gained the right to survive their husbands, the penalty of perpetual slavery was substituted for death.

There are, of course, a great number of widows in India who are protected by the personal affections of their families, but in the main the branding them as an outcast class who are fallen from all title to respect makes their lives that of slaves, and, indeed, reduces many of them to deserve the ignominy which is theirs whether they deserve it or not. Great numbers of Hindus have for a generation protested against the cruelty of the widows' treatment.

They have appealed to the authority of Scriptures earlier than those which modern Hindus follow in behalf of the natural rights of womanhood. That the emancipation sentiment should have become so strong that the barbers of Bombay feel its influence, and refuse any longer to be instruments in the perpetuation of the widows' oppression, signifies that the end of this oppression is near at hand.—Christian Union.

He who tries to solve the problem of his own existence will find that it takes just a little longer than a lifetime.—Century.

MABEL'S GRANDMA.

"The world is even as we take it, And life, dear child, is what we make it."

This was the sentiment of an old lady to her grandchild Mabel. And many a Mabel has found it to be true, and she has taken care of her health. She keeps on hand a supply of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, and so is not troubled with those wasting diseases, weaknesses, "dragging-down" sensations and functional irregularities that so many women endure. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

"Favorite Prescription" is a legitimate medicine, not a leverage. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to derange digestion. As peculiar in its remedial results as in its composition.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, particularly to the womb and its appendages. For feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon; being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic, or strength-giver.

The following is a letter from "The Mathushek Piano Mfg Co., New Haven, Conn.:"

JUNE 23, 1890.

JOHN F. COOPER, Esq.:

Dear Sir—Replying to your letter of the 4th inst., will say that we enclose copy of report of the Mathushek & Son Co., also a copy of the Musical Courier, containing an article relating to these people.

The above mentioned is all the information we have in the matter. It is very evident from the above report that the concern is not in a shape financially to do a very extensive business, but of course rival and unscrupulous dealers will make all they can out of it, in the hope of putting something else forward. It is only another of those desperate attempts to make capital from the name and reputation the Mathushek piano has gained. As a matter of fact it is really gratifying to see how much the name is appreciated, and that it is considered so valuable that previous failures don't seem to dampen the ardor of the projectors. We are confident in the belief, however, from the financial standing of the new concern, that no longer lease of life will be accorded them than was granted their predecessors. The Mathushek Piano is pretty well installed and we hardly think the public will be beguiled into buying a piano made by Jacob Brothers, for a Mathushek. A few may be influenced at first, but it will end like all the other attempts, in a first class advertisement.

Yours very respectfully,

* THE MATHUSHEK PIANO MFG CO.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County.

The people of the State of California,

To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

By W. W. RHODES, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, July 9, 1890

JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. GETT, JR.,
Attorney for Petitioner.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business.

A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

In all ages, cities that have enjoyed the distinction of being selected as seats of government have played an important part in the development in the nations or divisions of which they were a part. The mere mention of Babylon, Alexandria, Athens, Rome and Carthage calls to mind the national greatness with which those cities were so conspicuously identified. The capitals of Europe are to-day most important centers of the world's commercial traffic, and the acknowledged leaders in human advancement. What would England be without London, France without Paris, Russia without St. Petersburg, Austria without Vienna? So the various capitals of the American Union have been prominent factors in promoting the growth and developing the resources of our great sisterhood of States. The grand old commonwealth of Massachusetts "in which the cradle of American liberty was first rocked," owes her influence upon the civilization of our age largely to the ascendancy of Bostonian culture. Indiana could not have attained to her present development but for Indianapolis, and Iowa's growth of late years especially, has been greatly assisted by the enterprise of Des Moines.

In the astonishing development of California during the last four decades Sacramento has in past years taken a creditable part. It was her leading citizens and capitalists who first put into execution the gigantic enterprise of constructing a railway across the continent. It was at this place that the first steps were taken under American rule to inaugurate civil government in California, and here Americans first engaged in mercantile pursuits. For many years Sacramento exerted an important influence in the political history of the State and was an important factor in her commercial development. But notwithstanding early advantages and the record of an illustrious and honorable past, our citizens have now to face the unpleasant fact that Sacramento has not been keeping pace with the general progressive movement of the Golden State. Instead of taking the lead in every advance movement as her commanding position and surrounding advantages afford every opportunity to do, the city has existed more in the nature of an antiquated relic of pioneer times, than as an exemplification of active nineteenth century progress. The tourist who has visited the Capital cities of Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska and Colorado, States whose admission into the Union is comparatively recent, and who has observed how St. Paul, Topeka, Lincoln and Denver lead the van of progress in their respective commonwealths, is ill prepared to gaze upon the dilapidated business structures that disfigure our principal thoroughfares, and whose only excuse for existence lies in the total absence on the part of certain owners of property of everything bearing the least resemblance to intelligent enterprise and public spirit. Still less is the mind of the stranger prepared to contemplate the colossal failure of our citizens to combine their energies in some enlightened efforts to promote the public good if he has visited the growing cities of the coast, observed the rising of their substantial business blocks, witnessed the advent in their midst of the latest modern improvements, and noted the aggressive zeal for the common welfare that animates every movement of the people. The tenderfoot, expecting to see here massive, enduring buildings, fitting monuments to Sacramento's enterprise, is utterly dumbfounded when he comes to realize the actual state of things. The appearance of the rattle-traps of Chinatown, and the loud odors issuing from the habitations of the Celestials, are not calculated to awaken emotions of admiration as he enters the city. If a capitalist, desirous of making investments in some promising commercial center, his enthusiasm for Sacramento is not likely to be enhanced by the atmosphere of supreme contentment with existing conditions that here prevails. Owners of building—or excuses for such—appear satisfied with present rentals that could readily be very much augmented by judicious expenditure in putting up new structures that would be ornaments to the city as well as sources of pecuniary profit to the builders. Merchants, wholesale and retail, have been doing business in one story edifices, when in imperative need of enlarged facilities. Our citizens have been content to wade through almost bottomless streets in the winter season, and to put up with diurnal alternations of mud and dust in summer. The unsightly wooden awnings, utilized by some silurians as a substitute for umbrellas, are suggestive of a southern city, remote from railway communication, whose progress has been woefully retarded by the ravages of war and the ancient sign boards that yet adorn(?) some of our business houses, cause one to speculate upon various problems connected with human existence in past ages. The sidewalks of our city are a long distance behind the times, and not in harmony with the general spirit of this progressive age. Lovers of the art divine are now treated to evening concerts possibly because the summer's sun, having dried up the mudpuddle on the postoffice site, the musical amphibians have been compelled to cease piping forth their melodious notes until the fall rains set in, and the people must have some kind of a substitute. What American city of its size has ever been made the distributing center of so vast an amount of mineral wealth as has Sacramento? Where does history furnish another example of a place so splendidly situated near to the richest gold mines in the world, and with all the advantages of deep water navigation? But opportunities have been neglected, and here we are plodding along in the same old rut because of lack of public spirit.

This dark picture is not, however, without its brighter aspects. Encouraging signs of a change are observable in many directions. The large majority the bond measure received at the municipal election held on the 9th inst., was a terrible knock-out for silurianism, and indicates that our people are at length awakening from their long Rip Van Winkle slumber. Several imposing edifices that have recently been erected, together with others in contemplation, afford reason to believe that the era of inferior business structures is fast passing away, and that large substantial edifices will eventually supersede the present hideous deformity.

The Republican party has passed through another primary in this county, and in the city there has been the usual exhibition of feeling. It would seem it should be possible political primaries could be conducted without rowdiness, but it is unfortunate that on every occasion when they are held here, men who ought to be in better business avail of the opportunity to make unseemly exhibition of themselves. The better element of the community feel not at all pleased at these matters, and if the men who howl as wild beasts at the polls, could see themselves as the generality of people observe them, they would appreciate their disparity. It is certainly to be regretted men will so far forget themselves as to lose their temper, and it is more to be regretted that men who demand public respect will countenance the employment of human brutes on election day. As is usual, the press stated that politics were extremely lively. They were no more lively than usual, and the members of the rowdy element who availed themselves of this opportunity to advertise the natures for which they are perhaps not responsible can be counted upon the fingers of our hands. We have thought that the primary system should be abolished, and that delegates to conventions should be elected through the instrumentality of local clubs. By that plan there would be some guarantee that the debased could be made to keep their hands off and not insult the better element that predominates.

The result of the deliberations of the Republican Convention is before the people of the county. The ticket carries upon it the name of no man whom in conscience cannot be supported, and is the result of the labor of the largest convention that ever met in Sacramento county. We feel the thinking voters will support it, but fully appreciate that the candidates will have to run the gauntlet of the ward strikers and the chronic malcontents. It seems unfortunate that before the opening of the campaign here, a disposition was manifested to interject filth into it and we forecast the establishment of assaulting mud batteries. From the experience we have had as a candidate and as Chairman of the Central Committee, we foresee the quarters from which the slime will flow. However, we believe the Republican Committee will adopt the policy of making a fight in which there will be no concealment from the public. We have always trusted the people, and know if they have a reasonable opportunity they will be just. We have very fully in former issues explained the political situation as it did exist, and feel some little pride that the popular vote of the Republican party has sustained us. To what is passed, reference need not be made. What is now desired is that the people will endorse the action of the convention, as they should, and that the campaign will be cleanly conducted. We desire only for a just expression from the intelligent and responsible citizens of this community, and their aid to protect the nominees on the ticket from treachery and blackmail. Any man who has been a candidate for office will fully appreciate what we mean, and will realize how unjustly aspirants are robbed and to what embarrassments they are subjected.

The death of General Fremont calls to mind the famous Woolly Horse campaign, that being the designation applied to Fremont. Col. Thomas H. Benton was in the height of his glory, serving his thirty years' term as United States Senator at Washington. He was the recognized chief of the Democratic party in Congress, possibly not a bigger man than old Jackson, but facile princeps in his party with that one exception. He was withal a portly, important-looking, loud-voiced person, with a full sense of his own dignity. He was also the father-in-law of Gen. Fremont, then a young army captain, building up a monument of fame as a pathfinder in the Rocky Mountains. Benton was especially proud of this connection. In the course of his peregrinations Barnum and his woolly steed arrived at Washington, and a commodious room was engaged near the Capitol. The front of the building was covered with wonderful transparencies, representing the perilous capture of the strange creature by Fremont on the loftiest peak of the Rockies, the brass band began to play, and the exhibition opened. The martial sounds caught the ear of "Old Bullion;" he looked up, saw the pictures and read the legend. His brow assumed its darkest frown. He stalked into the building disdainfully, hurling aside the ticket taker. He looked at the woolly horse with withering contempt. Turning around he cried out in a voice of thunder: "Where's the man that owns that thing?" The proprietor approached with his most obsequious smile. "Do you mean to tell me," roared Old Bullion in his most stentorian tones, "that that infernal, spavined, broken-winded old mule was sent here from Pike's Peak by Capt. Fremont?" "Certainly, sir," was the reply, "here's a certificate to prove it." This was too much. "Look here, my man," said the Colonel, shaking his heavy hickory stick in the poor man's face, "if you and your swindling exhibition don't get out of Washington before sundown I'll have that beast in the pound and you in the penitentiary." And as he marched out he smashed in one or two of the most objectionable pictures with his stick. The exhibition closed immediately, but it is only fair to say that Barnum of late years pretends to deny that he was the exhibitor when the show opened in Washington.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government was Established from Chaos.

PART XIV.

The City Council again met September 8, 1849, the President, A. M. Winn in the chair. The committee appointed to draft a charter for the city submitted their report, with draft for a charter and a motion for its adoption was deferred to the next meeting. The terms of that draft for charter cannot now be ascertained, as it was not granted and the draft is lost. The committee appointed to correspond and confer with the citizens of San Francisco, in reference to the suffering situation of the overland immigration, reported that they had performed their duties as such committee, and, on motion of Mr. Cornwall, it was Resolved, that the City Council call a meeting of the citizens of Sacramento city, at the St. Louis Exchange, on Monday evening at 7 o'clock, to adopt prompt and efficient means for relieving our suffering fellow citizens, now on their overland route to this country." The meeting was held according to the resolution. E. F. Gillespie was called to the Chair, and P. P. Cornwall made Secretary. The meeting appointed H. E. Robinson, Barton Lee, G. Smith and J. S. Thomas a committee with power to act in the premises. This committee proceeded to collect money and send out supplies and assistance, the particulars of which are lost among the many charities of the time.

Mr. Stout, member of the committee on wharves and streets being absent, on motion of Mr. Gillespie, Mr. Cornwall was appointed to supply the vacancy at this meeting of the Council. John T. Codlin presented a petition praying that the Council grant him the privilege of establishing a market upon the levee, which petition was laid over for further consideration. Mr. Samuel Brannan presented a petition praying for the election of another Councilman to fill the vacancy occasioned by the absence of Mr. Stout. This petition was laid on the table and the Council then adjourned. Thus day by day the city of Sacramento was crystallizing into a shape it later took on governments. The streets and levee were objects of special regard. Parties desiring to enter into certain kinds of business requiring grant, came to the Council for relief. The Council called a meeting to give direction to public sentiment, provided for the relief of suffering emigrants and generally assisted the power of a municipal corporation, and the inhabitants, permanent and transient, acquiesced in the asserted powers.

The Council again convened on Monday the 10th of September, 1849, pursuant to adjournment. Present: Winn, Cornwall, Rogers, Robinson, Chapman. But did no business except to postpone the consideration of the draft for a charter reported at a previous meeting to the next day, and when the Council met on the evening of the 11th, it took up the draft for consideration. It was read in its entirety and then each section was made the subject of minute investigation. Extensive amendments were proposed and adopted and the Secretary was ordered to engross the same and lay it before the council at its next meeting.

The next meeting of the Council was held September 12, 1849. The city charter was passed to its second reading, and it was finally adopted by the unanimous vote of the Council, and it was Resolved, that the President of the City Council of Sacramento city be instructed and authorized to procure the printing of 300 copies of the city charter as adopted by the Council, and see that they be properly circulated, and that he issue a proclamation calling for an election by the people of Sacramento city, to be held at the St. Louis Exchange on Second street, on Thursday, the 20th day of September, at which time and place polls shall be opened from 10 o'clock A. M. to 5 P. M., and all citizens wishing to vote for the adoption of said charter may each deposit a ticket with the words "for adoption" written or printed thereon, and all citizens opposed to said charter may each deposit his vote with the words "for rejection" thereon. The proclamation was to contain the statement that if a majority of the votes cast at said election shall be for adoption, then the charter shall be in full force and effect by the authority of the people.

Placer Times, Sept. 15, 1849.

PROCLAMATION.—By order of the City Council of Sacramento city.

The people of Sacramento city, having elected a City Council without defining their powers, fixing their duties, or declaring the boundaries of the city, and the Council feeling the necessity of consulting the people upon a subject so important to the welfare and future prosperity of the city, have with great care, legal advice and mature deliberation, drawn up and unanimously adopted a charter for the government of the Council and their successors in office. The charter will be printed and circulated among our citizens for examination, and on Thursday next they will assemble at the St. Louis Exchange, on Second street, between I and J, and at 10 o'clock A. M., or as soon thereafter as possible, the people will select from their number present, three judges and two clerks, to hold an election for said charter. * * * If the majority of the votes cast are in favor of the charter, then the judges of election will make their returns to the Recorder, who will record the result and immediately notify the Council thereof, after which the President and the Council will feel instructed to proceed at once to pass such ordinances and appoint such officers as the interests and safety of our city demands. * * Sacramento city, Sep. 13, 1849.

A. M. WINN, President.

A public meeting was held at the St. Louis Exchange on the Monday before the election, to discuss the merits and demerits of the charter. At that meeting, A. M. Winn and J. C. Zabriskie, both friends of the charter, were respectively President and Secretary. The discussion took a wide range, and the opponents made violent attacks on members of the City Council, aspersing their motives and ridiculing their ability as legislators, and the votes indicated that the voters were with the objectors. The result was the sustaining of a direct assault on the integrity of the members of the Council, and they were not the men to rest quiet under the indignity.

The electors of the city thus called on to directly vote on the question, shall the City Council be clothed with the powers they ask, and are contained in the draft for the charter, turned out in force on the day of election (Thursday, Sep. 20, 1849). It is to be regretted that this draft for a charter is lost. We may be sure it contained provisions for taxation in the form of licenses, as well as a system of direct taxation. It provided for restricting certain liberties the citizens had enjoyed, and the people were not yet educated up to the point of submitting to a regular code of laws to be enforced by officers appointed by the Council. The votes when duly counted resulted: For the charter, 381; against the charter, 527; and so the charter, made with so much care by the City Council, was rejected. The members of the City Council were at first disheartened and talked of resigning their positions and allowing local matters to return to chaos. But on further and more mature consideration they came to the conclusion that they would retain what power they had, and if possible pluck victory out of defeat by further well defined action.

To the City Council the rejection of their charter was wholly unexpected, and when it again met on the evening of the election, after the votes had been counted, a quorum was wanting. They still had under advisement the question whether they should resign. Their place of meeting had till then been at the embarcadero and it entered an order adjourning to Sutter's fort for its further sessions. In one sense it may be said the Council represented the landed interests of the city, rather than the commercial, whilst those who voted against its charter were the commercial classes. The former, above all things, wanted stable government. The latter cared for it only so far as to enable them to trade successfully and make sale of their goods. The seat of commercial power had been transferred to the embarcadero. The affections of the land owners still clung to Sutter's fort, and the Council again met at Sutter's fort, September 21, A. M. Winn in the chair. The Council having failed to secure a charter by vote of the people, now assumed the power of preparing ordinances for the government of the city, and it resolved that John P. Rogers, A. M. Winn and H. E. Robinson be and they are hereby appointed a committee to wait upon the owners of the property fronting on the levee, and secure the possession of the levee from them, and the committee were instructed to act in conjunction with the Sheriff in clearing all obstructions from the levee; and the Council further resolved that P. B. Cornwall, E. F. Gillespie and T. L. Chapman be appointed a committee to draft and present to the Council at its next meeting an ordinance for leasing the levee. The Council then adjourned to meet at the store of Mr. Robinson, at the fort. The next evening the Council met at the store of H. E. Robinson, but no quorum being present, it adjourned to meet at the call of the President, and it did not again convene till September 28, when the following resolution was adopted: That a committee of five be appointed to propose an address to the people, and the committee was thus constituted: A. M. Winn, Robinson, Rogers, Jennings and Chapman, and it was directed to report at the next meeting, which occurred on the next day at the office of John P. Rogers, and the committee reported the following address, and directed that it be printed and circulated:

PROCLAMATION.—To the people of Sacramento city, by order of the President of the City Council:

On the first day of August, 1849, we were elected Councilmen of this city, and our powers and duties were not defined. On the 18th day of September following, we presented to you a charter for your consideration, which you have seen fit to reject by a majority of 146 votes. Since then we have been unable to determine what the good people of this city desire us to do, and being republicans in principle, and having every confidence in the ability of the people to govern themselves, we again request the residents of Sacramento city to meet at the St. Louis Exchange, at half past seven o'clock, then and there to declare what they wish the City Council to do. If you wish us to act under the Mexican laws now in force, however inapplicable they may be to our condition, then we must do the best we can. If you have objections to particular features of the charter, then strike out the objectionable features and insert such as you desire. The health and safety of our city demand immediate action on your part, for in our primitive condition, in the absence of legislative authority, we can in fact be of no service to you without your confidence and consent, and the meeting was fixed for Wednesday of next week.

PLAIN SERMONS.

"Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

Is it not strange that people will persist in calling the Bible, the whole Bible, a sacred work, the revealed will of God to man, when they see and know that every sin, however abominable and abhorrent, is sanctioned by some part of that work? To me, many parts of the Bible appear to have been written by inspiration, and contain instruction calculated to make us wiser, and consequently better and happier. There is much in the Bible that breathes a spirit of love and good will; much to encourage us in good works; and there is, also, much to comfort us in affliction—in short, there is much suited to our wants in every condition of life. These passages I prize more than any amount of silver and gold; they are beyond all price. But to say that a wise, just, pure, and virtuous being, infinite and perfect in all his attributes, ever gave to man such a bundle of contradictions, absurdities, cruelties, injustice, and vulgarity as can be gathered from the Old Testament, would be a libel on his character, to say the least.

In one place we are told that God is a man of war, slaying his thousands, and in another place that His name and nature are love, and that He willeth not the death of any, but that all should come to the knowledge of the truth. In one place we read that He is a jealous God, and is angry with the wicked every day; just as though a being of infinite goodness could indulge jealousy and anger, two of the most despicable, degrading passions that man or beast can indulge. And then, again, we read that He is all mercy and loving kindness, causing his blessings to fall impartially on all His creatures, the sinful as well as the righteous. In one place we are told that He chose a certain people for His own, and blessed them above all others; and though they sinned against Him continually and trampled His commands under foot, He still owned and blessed them, and commanded them to slay whole nations, not even sparing innocent women and harmless children, and then take possession of their homes. And in another place we are told that He commanded a whole tribe of his own chosen people to be slain, not because they had transgressed, but because their forefathers had broken His commands, long before this generation that He was about to punish were born! Does that look like mercy, or even like justice? What would be said of our government if it were to hang descendants of Arnold of the fifth or sixth generation, because their forefather had been a traitor ages before they were born?

Well, what was the result, after He had commanded this tribe to be utterly destroyed? Why, his holy people went out to war, and slew men, women, and children, determined to kill every soul of them according to the command; but six hundred of the men fled to the wilderness and escaped. Then, notwithstanding they pretended the Lord had ordered them to slay this whole tribe, when they assembled at their great feast, they wept and bewailed because one of their tribe was cut off, and began to inquire what they could do for the lost tribe. So they planned to restore it; pretending that this, too, was commanded or sanctioned of God. Their plan was to go out and make war on another nation, to slay all the men and children, and women who had known men, and bring the virgins alive, and give them as wives to the six hundred men whom the Lord had tried to kill and couldn't, and thus raise up seed to their brethren and restore the tribe they had tried, at the command of the Lord to destroy. In this battle, after killing all others, they took four hundred virgins and gave them to the six hundred men for wives. Now, what kind of a marriage was this for a wise and pure being to plan? How much love and affection would these females have for husbands for whose benefit their own fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters had been slain?

After obtaining these four hundred virgins, there were still two hundred men without wives, so another plan was matured, with a "thus saith the Lord." This plan was for the two hundred men to go out to a neighboring country and lay in wait in the vineyards, and when the damsels came out to dance, each man was to spring from his hiding place and catch a wife. Another singular sort of marriage for an infinitely wise being to order, without any regard to the physical, moral, or spiritual fitness of the parties for each other; and all this to save a breed of people so wicked that the Lord had tried to destroy them all, root and branch, but couldn't, because six hundred of them hid in the wilderness and kept out of sight until his anger had cooled. These are but a few of the many inconsistencies and absurdities of the Old Testament, a book which probably has done, and is still doing, more harm than any other ever published. At this moment, the Mormons are defending their polygamy by the Old Testament; and the leaders of them have not as yet succeeded in getting a tenth part of the number of wives possessed by David, the man after God's own heart, or by Solomon, the wisest man of his time. The Jews, who pretended to be the chosen people of an impartial God, exterminated the people of Canaan and other countries under the Old Testament. Our own nation held four millions of human beings in bondage for many, many years, and has nearly exterminated the red men of the forest, under the sanction of the Old Testament. When Sickles was tried for murder, his counsel justified the act by the Old Testament; and many years ago, when the soldiers were about leaving Portland, Maine, to engage in the war of plunder and rapine in Mexico, a priest met them on the wharf, supplicated the favor of their armies in battles in their behalf, and then, presenting them with Bibles to cheer them in battle, exhorted them to go and fight manfully, like the heroes of old, in the cause of the Lord! The Old Testament encouraged them in fighting, and its leaves served as wadding for their guns! The rum-seller, as he plies his toddy-stick, calms the conscience of his reeling customer, and encourages him in his downward course, by the Scripture quotation: "Thou shalt spend thy money for wine, or strong drink, or whatsoever thy soul lusteth after."

"But," says one, "you don't understand the Old Testament; you must not take it literally as it reads, but you must spiritualize it. For instance, when we read that the Israelites destroyed the heathen nations, we must apply it ourselves in this way, viz: We must call the Israelites the good qualities and virtues that dwell in our hearts, and the heathen the evil passions that dwell in our flesh, and let the former destroy the latter; and when we read of the chosen people owning bondsmen or slaves, we are to understand that the good seed in our hearts must make bondsmen or servants of the passions that dwell in our flesh; and thus we can spiritualize the Old Testament, and not apply it literally, to the injury of our fellow men."

Well, if that is the meaning of the Bible, write it so. Change the language, and let it say just what it does mean. But I contend that a wise being never did set forth spiritual truths in language which nine hundred and ninety-nine in every thousand would understand as authority for war, slavery, drunkenness, and all other abominations.

"Well, then," asks one, "what will you do with the Bible, if part of it is good and part bad?" I will read it as I do any other book, and what reason, common sense, experience, history, or the light of truth within me approves as just, right, true, or good, I will receive, and what these witnesses disprove I will reject.

"That will not do," answers the opposer, "if I receive any of the Bible I must receive it all; or if I reject any of it I must reject all." A more thoughtless and foolish idea than this never existed. The various books of the Bible were written by various persons, in various places, and at various times, and were finally collected and bound in one volume. One person might write truth, under the inspiration of divine goodness, and another might write error without inspiration; and the fact that these writings happen to be bound up in the same volume does not alter the character of any of them. What was true remains to be true, and what was false remains to be false; and we are under no more obligation to receive all as truth because a part is true, nor reject all as error because part is error, than we are to believe Gulliver's travels because Christ spake the truth, or reject Christ because Gulliver told lies.

And now, my pious brother and sister, do not be shocked because I have overhauled the sacred book a little, for my text, which comprises a part of that book, tells me to prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. As the Bible is a part of all things, I am, of course, commanded to prove that; and I find slavery, war, murder, drunkenness, and many other things which the Old Testament sanctions, are not good, but are evil and only evil, I reject them and all that upholds them; and as I find love, truth, mercy, brotherly kindness, and many other things which parts of the Bible uphold are good, I hold them fast, together with those parts of the Bible that approve them.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Mme. Modjeska says she cannot afford to get angry for the reason that to lose one's temper is to lose one's beauty. Husbands who have scolding wives might do themselves a good turn by cutting this out and pasting it on the looking-glass.

The latest play on the tapis is one called The Oath. A horse appears in the play and throws his rider in a tank of water. A large dog appears, bites the horse, who disappears, and then the dog, not the horse, plunges into the tank and rescues the man.—Tableau.

James E. Murdock contributes "A Short Study of Hamlet" to the July Forum. He contends that Hamlet was not insane, though perhaps so melancholy as to be approaching that condition. "To make Hamlet mad," Murdock says, "would be to violate a dramatic law that Shakespeare himself created and most carefully observes through all his plays, viz.: contrast in character. Poor Tom's deceit is to foil Lear's madness; so, conversely, Ophelia's madness is the foil to Hamlet's feigning. Ophelia is mad in fact, Hamlet but in craft; and to make the madness of both a reality would be to duplicate types, a fault the genius of the great dramatist could not allow him to commit."

Modjeska blames a cat for one of the most wretched moments of her life. She was playing Camille. The climax is reached when, seeing her wasted form in the glass after her sickness, Camille expresses herself in a dismal shriek. This evening, preceding this crowning yell perhaps a minute, there strolled upon the stage at the first entrance a most leisurely cat—one of the sex which votes. He proceeded along the footlights some ten feet, and then, bending his yellow gaze on the alien with the big fiddle, stood in feline admiration of the virtuoso. Modjeska, busy with her work, with her back to the front, saw nothing, and, at the proper place, floated forth a shriek, the like of which had not been voiced by Polish throat since Kosciusko fell. The effect on the cat was magic itself. Never in the somber alley or the high ecstasy of a moonlighted roof, neither in loving, spooning nor mortal fight, had he ever produced or heard a noise its equal. Turning wildly, his reason overthrown, his horror-stricken tail as large as a baby's leg, he fled, while the people roared and yelled. Poor Modjeska almost fainted, and, suspecting the cause to be some deficiency in garb, stuck her ten fingers to her costume and cantered after the cat.—Exchange.

Elsa and the Imprisoned Fairy, is the name of a new Cantata for juvenile voices. In this Cantata much variety is presented upon a very slender foundation. A little sprite, "too cautious and wary," refuses to taste the nectar a fairy has made from the petal of a flower. For her disobedience, she is to remain a captive in an oak tree, "till mortal shall have eyes to see" that a fairy dwells therein. "Successively, dawn, maidens, milkmaids, schoolboys, the four seasons, shepherds and shepherdesses, pass the tree without discovering the imprisoned fairy. Her release is at last effected through the intercession of Elsa—the Baron's lovely daughter—whose purity makes her a fitting person for the task. Elsa is accompanied to the woods by her governess. Fraulein sees more beauty in verbs and nouns than in hills and downs, and gives vent to her feelings in an amusing song praising the beauties of maps, sums, scales, and the like. The schoolboys confess they do not care for Greek odes, Gallic wars, Olympian games; but they rise to a sense of the glory of football or cricket. They have no small amount of fun with the relentless Fraulein. Elsa may be performed simply as a musical work, or as a stage piece. In this case, the one scene required could be easily put together; the dresses are not a troublesome item. The music is sparkling and effective, without being difficult. The whole would form a pleasant entertainment.

An eminent physician has lately discovered that excessive whip-cracking is an early and infallible symptom of homicidal mania. The cabman who is the victim of this terrible disease, cracks his whip because the sound reminds him of the crack of a revolver, and while he is engaged in the act he is gloating over the men and women whom, in his diseased imagination, he is shooting down.

In a recent Illinois court a ludicrous question arose in the case of Knapp v. Preferred Mutual Accident Association, where it was held that operating a buzz saw is not incident to the employment or condition of a "retired gentleman." The court enumerated a large number of amusements and occupations in which "a retired gentleman" injured by impudent toying with a buzz saw might still engage, and said that "the practice of operating a buzz saw is proverbially dangerous, and is probably not less so when engaged in for amusement than when practiced as a business or occupation."

Caleb Cushing had little poetry in his nature, but he was not insensible to the beauties the beautiful little Plum island, in the Merrimac. It was the practical and tangible, however, which most pleased him. "What species of tree is that," he asked one after another of his fellow voyagers on a trip down the river, pointing to a tree on the shore, rather peculiar in form and foliage. No one could give him the desired information, and the matter was soon forgotten by all save Cushing, who never gave up a problem he had once taken hold of. It was some days later that a member of the party received a manuscript, in which the tree was not only properly named and described, but a regular botanical essay was included, the results of Cushing's zeal and research.

The following is a correct transcript of the most memorable judicial sentence which has ever been uttered by human lips in the annals of the world. This curious document was discovered in A. D. 1280, in the city of Aquill, in the kingdom of Naples, in the course of a search made for the discovery of Roman antiquities; and it remained there until it was found by the Commissaries of Art in the French army of Italy. Up to the time of the campaign in Southern Italy, it was preserved in the sacristy of the Carthusians, near Naples, where it was kept in a box of ebony. Since then the relic has been kept in the Chapel of Caserta. The Carthusians obtained, by petition, leave that the plate might be kept by them as an acknowledgment of the sacrifices they had made for the French army. The French translation was made literally by members of the Commission of Art. Denon had a fac simile of the plate engraved, which was bought by Lord Howard, on the sale of his cabinet, for 2,800 francs. There seems to be no historical doubt, says the Kölnische Zeitung, as to the authenticity of this document, and it is obvious to remark that the reasons of the sentence correspond exactly with those recorded in the gospels. The sentence itself runs as follows:

Sentence pronounced by Pontius Pilate, intendent of lower Galilee, that Jesus of Nazareth shall suffer death by the cross. In the seventeenth year of the reign of the Emperor Tiberius, and on the 25th of March, in the most holy city of Jerusalem, during the pontificate of Annas and Caiaphas, Pontius Pilate, intendent of the province of lower Galilee, sitting in judgment in the presidential chair, of the praetor, sentences Jesus of Nazareth to death on a cross, between two robbers, as the numerous testimonys of the people prove that—first, Jesus is a misleader; second, he has excited the people to sedition; third, he is an enemy to the laws; fourth, he calls himself the son of God; fifth, he calls himself falsely the king of Israel; sixth, he went to the temple followed by a multitude carrying palms in their hands.

It likewise orders the first centurion, Quirillus Cornelius, to bring him to the place of execution, and forbids all persons, rich or poor, to prevent the execution of Jesus. The witnesses who have signed the execution against Jesus are: First, Daniel Robani, a pharisee; second, John Zorobabel; third, Raphael Robani, fourth, Capet. Finally, it orders that the said Jesus be taken out of Jerusalem through the gate of Tournea.

NOTES.

It is learned that one of our local literary geniuses is writing a play, in which he deals with the Indian question. It is all Lo comedy, with a few hair-raising episodes.

P. B. Ball was divorced from Minnie Ball in San Francisco a few days ago for her desertion. This is not the first time a minnie ball went off and did harm. They are dangerous things when you stand at the wrong end of the weapon.

The "Mecca Temple of the ancient Arabic Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine" has left New York for this coast. At last accounts the trainmen were filling the last car with the rest of the name, and if those officials do not break their necks over the thing they hope to get it through on time.

The Second Battalion Grenadier Guard of the English army, which has hitherto been looked upon as the flower of the British army, has up to this time had its headquarters in London. Lately, some of its members have shown signs of insubordination, and as a punishment the battalion has been banished to Bermuda for duty. In the course of his address to the officers before their departure, the commander-in-chief, the Duke of Cambridge, said: "I can no longer speak of you as guards." Being insubordinate, of course they will be hereafter known as disgrards.

The following may be what is, in the slang of the day, a "chestnut," to some; to others, however, it may be what it really is, a curiosity in literature. It is a species of composition which consists of all Latin words, but by allowing for false spelling, and running the words into each other, it will be seen that the sentence contains good sense in English:

Mollis abuti
Hias an acuti;
No lasso finis,
Molli divinis.
Omi de armis tres
Imi na dis tres.
Cantu disco ver
Meas alo ver?

Some of our young readers may spend a short time very profitably in an effort to translate it.

If some live, energetic, far-seeing capitalists were to call this way in their rambles, go to Folsom and study the substantial reservoir of water that has been housed in the American river by the prison dam, then take a view of and closely study the construction of the power house that is rapidly under way, they would be induced to come back to this city and acquire the privileges necessary to enable them to lead that water to the edge of town. There they could erect manufactories of all kinds: for tanning leather, making boots and shoes, running saw and planing mills, woolen and flour mills, furniture factories, paper mills, in a word they would have motive power for any use conceivable in commercial enterprise and give work to hundreds of men, women and children who would make their homes here, and consequently not only increase the population but give the city some other dependence besides the railroad shops for her existence. No grander offering presents itself for a safe and profitable investment, for it could not but make a large and early return. But who is sufficiently public-spirited to take the first step?

The New York Sun publishes the following interesting conversation between a great Senator and a great editor: A terse and somewhat personal conversation occurred some time ago between Senator George Hearst and his son, in the bar-room of the Hoffman House. The son, who is a very long youth and rather runs to banged hair, sat solemnly opposite the genial old Senator one day while the latter talked about his racing stock. The season had been a very bad one for him. It was pretty well known that the son had come on to New York to get his father to foot some bills for the paper which the young man was running in San Francisco, and the man who happened to be around the table where the two Hearsts sat were familiar with the Senator's two important sources of expenditure. After the elder Hearst had finished speaking his son said: "Well, I should think you would learn in time to keep shy of a thing you know nothing about. Your stable has cost you a great amount of money this year." "Well, my son," said the Senator, calmly stroking his gray beard, and beaming with apparent amiability on his offspring, "that is good advice. If you had followed it and kept shy of things about which you know nothing, it would have saved me a very much more important source of expense. My stable is not a marker to your paper."

The band-stand that is used at the State Capitol Park, to say the very least, is by no means a thing of beauty, and therefore not at all a joy forever; it is not ornamental, but a veritable eyesore, of rough lumber, loosely nailed together, and bears close resemblance to some deserted, last political campaign country stump-speaking rostrum. And although it answers the purposes for which it was conceived and brought forth, it is a mystery why it should be allowed to forever and without end interrupt and impede the main entrance to the Capitol building, rearing its horrid front at the head of the steps of the last terrace. Strangers halt, and after racking their brains in an effort to discern its use, marvel that the authorities should allow it to mar an otherwise attractive approach to the edifice. It might with equal propriety be placed in the corridors before any of the State offices. It is as if a man built his stable in his front yard, or had his hen-roost on his piazza. It will not do to say the stand is in two sections and are separated so that people may pass between on their way to the entrance; that does not answer the objection. The thing should not be there; it is no place for it; it not only obstructs the way, but is a foul interruption to a fair view of the building from the time people enter the main gate on Tenth street. If it be imperative that it should remain on that side of the building and still be a disgrace, then in the name of decency why not have it removed to one side of the steps. Certainly the gentlemen composing the music committee are not going to take offense at the correction of this evil in this way; they are as much interested in having those grounds, the building and the approaches to it made as attractive to visitors as any one can be, and will harbor no umbrage toward any one if the rickety nuisance is abated somewhat by setting it a few feet one side or the other. But of course those gentlemen are also satisfied if the stand is allowed to remain anywhere as long as they are doing their duty to the people, and it must be most truthfully said, they are giving right royal satisfaction. Still they do not exact a sacrifice of a decent observance of the proprieties of things to the extent of monopolizing the front entrance of the State Capitol by the presence there of a frail frame of unshaven boards ccleped a "band-stand." Let it be remedied.

Political.

The Republican County Convention has held its session and presented its work to the people. It had been said a slate had been prepared and that it would be carried out. However, it is that no citizen of intelligence will say that the convention was governed by any programme; it would be absurd to contend that a convention of that size could be controlled. The ticket is exceptionally good. We review it briefly:

Judge W. C. Van Fleet was re-nominated by acclamation, and in the same manner that the nomination came to Judge McFarland six years ago. Of Judge Van Fleet we need not speak to the people of this county. We would much have preferred he should have been a candidate for the Supreme Justiceship. He has for six years administered evenhanded justice in the department of the Superior Court over which he has presided, and his impartiality and good judgment has won for him the distinguished compliment of a nomination by acclamation from the largest convention that ever assembled in this county. We feel that the people look upon the matter as did the delegates there assembled.

Hon. A. P. Catlin received the nomination for Superior Judge also. Judge Catlin is a lawyer who enjoys more than a State reputation, and it will be conceded that his opinion on legal matters will stand with that of any lawyer in the State. Men of the character of Samuel M. Wilson, Joseph P. Hoge, and men equally distinguished at the bar, will say of Judge Catlin he is fitted to fill any judicial position, be it as high as that of a member of the Federal Supreme Court Bench. The convention was fortunate in that it had for selection as against Judge Catlin, Robert T. Devlin, who is admittedly qualified for the position, and the closeness of the vote can be regarded as very complimentary to him.

For Assemblymen, there have been nominated Jud. C. Brusie, Elwood Bruner, and J. J. Campbell. Mr. Brusie has served one term in the Legislature, and is a young lawyer of ability and push. Mr. Bruner also served one term in the Assembly, and has filled satisfactorily the office of District Attorney. Mr. Campbell is a printer by trade and founded the Galt Gazette which he has published and edited for many years.

For Sheriff there has been nominated Geo. C. McMullen, who has been a faithful and active officer.

W. W. Rhoads, the nominee for County Clerk, is a young man who will be acknowledged to be familiar with the duties of the office.

Frank T. Johnson, the nominee for Auditor and Recorder, has filled the office for one term satisfactorily, and it cannot be said his administration can be justly criticised adversely.

Joseph Sims, the nominee for Assessor, was a member of the Stevenson regiment that had much to do with the conquest of California from Mexico. He is a pioneer resident of the county, and it cannot be said of him that he is not qualified to discharge the duties of the office to which he aspires.

Frank D. Ryan received the unanimous indorsement for District Attorney. He is a young lawyer who was born and raised in this community; his record is familiar to the people.

Edward Lyon, a merchant of prominence, was nominated for County Treasurer by a flattering majority, and his name adds weight to the ticket.

Geo. H. Clark, Sacramento raised, is named for Coroner. He is well known and strong.

Geo. W. Harlow, of Brighton, received the nomination for Public Administrator. He has filled the office for one term satisfactorily, during which it cannot be said he did injustice to the dead or the living.

Benj. F. Howard, an educator, is named for Superintendent of Public Instruction.

J. C. Boyd, for Surveyor; and A. J. Senatz and Thomas Jenkins for Supervisors.

For city officers, Geo. G. Davis was nominated for Police Judge, and James B. Devine and Col. Henry Starr for Justices of the Peace.

In future issues we will speak more in detail of the merits of the gentlemen who have been nominated, but we now assume they are so well known to the people of this city and county that they need no particular introduction.

An editor of this journal was, without his solicitation, chosen Chairman of the County Committee. To the party, and to the convention representing it, he tenders his sincere acknowledgment of gratitude, and will say he deeply appreciates the delicacy of the duties he is called upon to perform. It may as well be understood at the outset, however, that the campaign will be conducted with fearlessness, and that at its ending it will not be said the Republican party was in a position defensive. With a ticket such as has been named, we have no hesitation in saying it will succeed. It will be understood, that these men who have been named as candidates will be, from now until the closing of the polls in November, the prey of the vultures, and that they will be the subjects against whom the shafts of treachery will be directed. We simply ask of the better element of this community fairness.

The American Flag.

The masses of the north rallied to the flag. The masses of the south never quite warmed to the stars and bars; nor was there at any time during the war, any deep-seated hostile feeling against the stars and stripes among the confederate soldiers. The "Bonnie Blue Flag" was a poor jingle. The only spirit-stirring song we had was "Dixie," and we got that from Christy's minstrels, a northern troupe. The truth is, the Union had the music and the colors on us, as well as the numbers, and the north, at least, ought to be proud of us, that with such odds of muscle and sentiment against us, we stood out so long.

Happily we have the flag back again; that flag which never floated over a mean or cowardly action; whose history is an unbroken story of patriotism and valor, and which, as it spreads itself to the battle and the breeze, to the sunshine and the storm, tells to heaven and earth as plainly as words could tell, the origin and genius of our great republic.

God bless the flag! The south was never so fortunate as when she found herself encircled once more by its folds, drawn at Appomattox at the hands of a far seeing, magnanimous and brave man.—Henry Watterson in the Courier-Journal.

How to Make a Poem.

A celebrated old English author gives the following receipt for making an epic poem:

"Take of deities, male and female, as many as you can use; separate them into two equal parts, and keep Jupiter in the middle; let Juno put him in a ferment and Venus mollify him. Remember on all occasions to make use of volatile Mercury. If you have need of devils, draw them out of Milton's Paradise and extract your spirits from Tasso. When you cannot extricate your hero by any human means, or yourself by your own wit, seek relief from Heaven and the gods will do your business very readily. This is according to the direct prescription of Horace in his 'Art of Poetry' when he says a poet should never call upon the gods for their assistance, but when he is in great perplexity. For a tempest take Eurus, Lephyr, Auster and Boreus, and cast them together in one verse; add to these of rain, lightning and thunder (the loudest you can). Mix your clouds and billows well together till they foam, and thicken your description here and there with a quick-sand. Brew your tempest well in your head before you set it a blowing.

For a battle, pick a large quantity of images and descriptions from Homer's Iliad, with a spice or two of Virgil, and if there remain any overplus, you may lay them by for a skirmish. Season it well with similies and it will make an excellent battle.

For a burning town, old Troy is ready burnt to your hands. But if you fear that would be thought borrowed, a chapter or two from Burnett's "Theory of the Conflagration," well circumstanced, and done into verse, will be a good succedaneum.

As for similies and metaphors, they may be found all over the creation; the most ignorant may gather them, but the difficulty is in applying them. For this, advise with your bookseller.

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street.

Music, Climate and Gum Chewing.

The auspices governing the concert given at the Capitol Park last Sunday evening could scarcely have more nearly approached perfection. It was one of those balmy evenings, concluding a warm day, influenced by a refreshing, though moderate breeze, coming up from the south, such as have made our climate the world's wonder and delight and likened ours to an Italian clime; the music was a poetic dream of sweet sounds, pleasant to the soul; the throng, as if the city had emptied its residences of men, women and children into the handsome grounds, was an assemblage of feminine beauty and loveliness as to the latter half, while the sterner half felt a pardonable pride that they were permitted to do escort duty to young ladies, handsomer or more graceful than whom cannot be found on the Western hemisphere, for be it truthfully admitted, and without fulsome laudation, Sacramento, indeed, has of her female population faces that for perfect and natural beauty cannot be excelled even by the famed senoritas of ancient Andalusia.

The graveled walks, the close-mown terraces, the convenient balconies were all thronged with the joyous, pressing mass, bent only on the greatest enjoyment. What a time, what an opportunity for the study of human nature! It was an open volume for the tuition of the philosopher or the stoic. Here was to be found every type of the human being of both sexes. A slow, pensive walk about those grounds, surrounded by the serging, pushing, gay, gossiping, giddy groups, and one could but contemplate and marvel, is it all of life to live? Is this the great desideratum of life, to shout, to laugh, to run and jump and play, and talk soft nonsense to kindred listening spirits? Is there no other destiny, no other aim or object in life for the modern youth? And how shocked the soul, how shattered the idol, as one listened to the unrefined phrases, the vulgar slang, the boisterous tones emanating from handsome beings whose lips nature designed for sweeter accomplishments! One could but reflect and sigh that those talents could not have been trained to benefit and bless the world by rare examples rather than that they should tempt to more despicable doings. And, then again, to realize that most of those perfect mouths should be devoted to the unholly calling of a never-ending mastication of that vile compound of gum, whose component parts, did its fair patrons but know them, might induce them to eschew the habit rather than chew the stuff.

It will not be libelous to venture the assertion that perhaps five out of every ten of those otherwise fascinating creatures, detracted excessively from their proper enunciation by a mouth crammed with gum, on which they only ceased a continuous munching long enough to utter some well-worn, vulgar slang to a passing acquaintance, or in reply to a smart effort of a gallant escort. Thus the evening waned, as between the strains of the delightful music one could hear the ceaseless sound of gum chewing, so reminiscent of the young swine in a tub of hot swill, or else had his ears regaled with such endearing terms as "Ah there, my daisy," "Oh, I'm dead onto you, Jack," "Get off your perch," "Where did you get that hat," "Oh, ain't he cute," "It's perfectly rotten," "Oh what a way up time we had last night," "That fellow's no good," "He's a snide snoozer," "He ain't got a bean," "There's no flies on me," "Oh what a crank you are," etc.

Of course such literary treats were not confined to the fair and dear sex who some day may rock the cradles of statesmen, but equally indulged by the favored ones who protected the weaker vessel—those young gallants who are soon to direct the destinies of a State. How encouraging, how promising, how hopeful for the prospects of firm, favored government, erected on a base of patriotism and dependent on the education and literary attainments of the generation to succeed in time to come!

Bona Fide.

In a recent case before the Register of the United States Land Office in this city, the Register rejected the application of the claimant, with a recommendation to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that a special agent be appointed to examine into the bona fides of the application. "Great God!" said the applicant, "Mr. Register, I never had any bona fides in my life. I did file on a piece of land once in Tulare county, but never owned any bona fides."

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 99° and 54°, with gentle northerly winds in the middle of the day, and gentle southerly winds at night and in the morning. The highest and lowest one year ago was 94° and 50°, with clear skies and variable winds.

Penology.

Robert T. Devlin, President of the State Board of Prison Directors of California, has submitted his report on the various reformatory and penal institutions of the United States. The report is well worthy of perusal; particularly so the chapter on the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, where solitary confinement of prisoners is most rigidly enforced. Charles Dickens, in his "American Notes," thus writes of this famous prison-house:

In the outskirts stands a great prison called the Eastern Penitentiary, conducted on a plan peculiar to the State of Pennsylvania. The system here is rigid, strict, and hopeless solitary confinement. I believe it in its effects to be cruel and wrong. In its intention, I am well convinced that it is kind, humane, and meant for reformation; but I am persuaded that those who devised this system of prison discipline, and those benevolent gentlemen who carry it into execution, do not know what it is that they are doing. I believe that very few men are capable of estimating the immense amount of torture and agony which this dreadful punishment, prolonged for years, inflicts upon the sufferers; and in guessing at it myself, and in reasoning from what I have seen written upon their faces, and what to my certain knowledge they feel within, I am only the more convinced that there is a depth of terrible endurance in it, which none but the sufferers themselves can fathom, and which no man has a right to inflict upon his fellow creature. * * * I was accompanied to this prison by two gentlemen officially connected with its management, and passed the day in going from cell to cell and talking with the inmates. Every facility was afforded me that utmost courtesy could suggest. Nothing was concealed or hidden from my view, and every piece of information that I sought was openly and frankly given. * * * In another cell there was a German, sentenced to five years' imprisonment for larceny, two of which had just expired. With colors procured in the same manner, he had painted every inch of the walls and ceiling quite beautifully. He had laid out the few feet of ground behind with exquisite neatness, and had made a little bed in the center that looked, by the bye, like a grave. The taste and ingenuity that he had displayed in everything were most extraordinary; and yet, a more dejected, heart-broken, wretched creature it would be difficult to imagine. I never saw such a picture of forlorn affliction and distress of mind. My heart bled for him: and when the tears ran down his cheeks, and he took one of the visitors aside to ask, with trembling hands nervously clutching at his coat to detain him, whether there was no hope of his dismal sentence being commuted, the spectacle was really too painful to witness. I never saw or heard of any kind of misery that impressed me more than the wretchedness of this man.

Congressman Allen Meets Mr. Morton.

A few days ago, while standing on a corner awaiting the arrival of a street car, the gentleman from Mississippi saw two distinguished looking individuals approaching. The moment his eye lit upon them his anxiety to board a car became intense.

"The car either couldn't or wouldn't come," he said afterwards, "and I couldn't go ahead without looking as if I were running away, and you know we never run down our way. So I did the best I could under the circumstances. I squared up against the lamp-post, with my back to the sidewalk, and tried to look unconcerned. It was no use. As soon as they got near me I heard one of them say: 'Hello, here's Allen, now. I say, Allen!' My heart went into my boots, but I stood firm, hearing nothing. He called again, and there was nothing to do but turn around."

"'Good morning, Senator,' I said. 'Thought that was you,' said he. 'I want to introduce you to the Vice-President. My friend, Mr. Allen, Mr. Morton.'"

"'Ah! I am glad to know you, Mr. Allen,' said Mr. Morton. 'I—ah—I was reading some of your poetry to my family at breakfast this morning.'"

"'Gad, man, I could have sunk through the pavement. I knew, of course, what he meant. It was that miserable thing I got off in the House, you know, like this:'"

"'The baby runs the white house, Morton runs the bar, Wanny runs the Sunday school, And, d— it, there you are.'"

"'Mean! I never felt so mean in my life. But Morton laughed, and finally I walked up to the Capitol with him, and found him an elegant and agreeable gentleman. That experience, however, ended one branch of human endeavor with me. I am no longer in the poetry business.'"

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Old Homestead will be given at the Metropolitan on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday nights. This is one of the most popular and entertaining dramas on the stage to-day. While Denman Thompson is not with this company, he has a substitute which is his superior.

Russell's Comedians, in The City Directory, are booked for an early date in this city. The first presentation of this splendid farce comedy on this coast last year, was in this city. It was a success then, and has proved a marvelous success elsewhere. There are some changes from the original design, including new and taking music. Charley Reed is a team in himself. All the comedians are of the highest order.

Modern Fashionable Music.

It is time that some one should question the tendencies in the American musical world toward the utter abandonment of English music. As the Italian opera gains foothold in this country, the rush into that style of music grows more marked. Even in such a place as Sacramento there are very many chances that a person will not hear an English song from the lips of his fair friends by visiting a dozen parlors. It is all opera, a kind of opera everywhere. The Italian predominates next in order is the German, next French and last English. Very little English music is sung at social or small musical gatherings; and unsophisticated ears hear, the Lord knows what (the singer don't), and remains unsatisfied. The taste for this music, so far as it is genuine, is very much an acquired taste. The rage for it is altogether a matter of fashion. It may be a fine vocal feat to execute it, but the charm of music in social life does not consist in its being difficult. Our home music would be greatly improved were this very difficult music utterly "impossible." The truth is that it takes training, for which unprofessional singers have no time, to sing it well, and the best we can do with it is to spoil it.

The opera is not a native American product. It is indigenous to no soil but that of Italy. It is the expression of no national life but that of Italy. In English and German, the opera is clumsy—in French, it is flimsy. Thus we, who compose the Yankee nation, with a strong, fiery, restless life of which the opera is no representative, speaking a language too robust and manly to be wedded to it, try to bring into our life this utterly foreign element. The opera does not belong in America. It cannot be produced by America. It has no natural affinities for our life. It has been forced upon us by enterprising managers, many of whom have ruined themselves in the attempt, and, at last it succeeds because fashion takes it under her wing. We get very little proper opera in the smaller cities, but we get extracts from opera, and nothing else, at every concert. For many years, the American people have hardly heard their own language sung except in a few churches. Even English and American singers seem to take delight in publicly misrepresenting a language which misrepresents them, and in murdering language and music at the same time. If, to anybody, these twain were lovely in their lives, it will be a comfort to know that in death they are usually not divided.

Making allowance for peculiar temperaments, and for the power of fashion, and for the force of an acquired taste, we unhesitatingly declare our belief that a great part of the apparent popularity of foreign music abides in affectation. Italian music is not the music of the American heart, and has no ministry to the American heart. We hear it, and if it is well sung we admire it, possibly wonder at it; but no more, or rarely no more. Yet, we have not heard a lady voluntarily sing a good old English or Scotch ballad, or American song, for a long time. Ask for a song, and they pitch into something that bears no more relation to the Anglo-Saxon race than "Old Dan Tucker" does to the Hebrew. We ought, perhaps, to say that music teachers have much of this to answer for. Foreign music teachers have been very plenty in this country for many years, and have done a great deal, we doubt not, to introduce their national music, because they know no other, and because, in their national conceit, they think it superior to all other.

It would be a great matter of delight to all truly musical people, to have a restoration of the old characteristic English music—songs, glees, ballads, etc.—that which most readily assimilates with American life, outside of the lines of our language, and is not in accordance with the laws of English musical expression. Besides, the great masters of the world have been German. We take kindly to this great, hearty, mystical, yet simple German life in all its manifestations, and to no manifestations more kindly than its musical.

It is vain to assert that music is a universal language. If it were it would be everywhere alike, whereas it is everywhere unlike. The music of France is as different from that of Germany as the music of Germany is different from that of Spain; while there can be no stronger contrast than that which obtains between the music of Italy and England. Instead of efforts to develop the music that is in the American heart and soul, we take law of other life, bow to ideas that are alien to our soil, and strive to do that which we cannot do, and which is not worth doing. Let us have Anglo-Saxon music in the Anglo-Saxon tongue.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of the guardianship of the estates of Mary F. Hennessy and Walter J. Hennessy, minors.

Elizabeth Hennessy, the guardian of the estates of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said minors, for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estates of said minors appear before the said Superior Court on the 29th day of August, 1890, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Court Room of said Superior Court, in the County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of the said minors as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week, for three successive weeks, in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Exploring The Ocean's Bed.

To study the bottom of the ocean it is necessary to go down into the sea. This truthful expression is very much misunderstood, as naturalists content themselves with fishing up submarine animals and making some sort of a general plan of the topography of the bottom by a succession of soundings. The results are quite frequently very far from what is actually the case, or from what could be obtained by a little more courage and the expenditure of a somewhat larger sum of money. Prof. Hermann Fol has not been disheartened by these considerations, and proposes undertaking the work of exploring the bottom of the Mediterranean by going down under the water himself. He has constructed a special outfit for his yacht, and has also made a peculiar kind of diving suit and air pump for the purpose.

By this new system he thinks that it will be possible to descend to great depths without injury to the ears or the breathing apparatus and with no danger of vertigo. The greatest inconvenience experienced is always found in coming up from great depths to points where the effects of the compression at a depth of about one hundred feet are gradually lessened, and it is this trouble that has limited diving to a depth of about one hundred and ten feet. When the water is transparent and the sun brilliant, the bottom can be seen at a depth of twenty-five yards from the deck of a vessel. In order to see through undisturbed water a scuttle closed by a thick glass plate has been put through the bottom of the yacht, by means of which the bottom can be plainly seen in spite of the waves. The appearance is as though it were perfectly flat, as there are no shadows cast, the light coming from above. In reality, however, when one goes down in the diving suit, he finds the bottom bristling with rocks and hollowed with valleys. The lighting of the bottom is like that of a room without windows, receiving its light through glass in the ceiling. To the one under the water light appears in the shape of a cone opened at about an angle of sixty-two degrees, outside of which everything is in shadow. Looking up while in the clear space the sky can be seen, and very often the clouds can be distinguished.

The intensity of the light under the water diminishes with great rapidity. At about ninety feet one sees very much less, and when the sun approaches the horizon, and the rays get much more oblique, it seems as though night had come. Horizontally, at 100 feet depth, a rock cannot be made out at a greater distance than twenty-five feet. Generally speaking, at a greater depth than thirty feet one cannot distinguish things under the conditions that ordinarily obtain. This will account for their inability to see their way on the part of those who attempt to navigate submarine boats. As soon as an object is seen it is so close that there is not time to steer clear of it. Navigation in deep water can only be in directions that have already been examined and found clear, which naturally confines submarine boats within very narrow limits.

Submarine life, such as fish, lobsters, etc., have the habit at the very first apprehension of danger of darting rapidly away and of stopping equally quick. They seem to understand that a very few yards will get them beyond the vision of their enemy. The shading of the water varies from blue to greenish. Objects at a depth of thirty feet take a blue tinge, and at from seventy-five to ninety feet the light is such a deep blue that objects of a red shade appear black. When one returns quickly to the surface with his eyes accustomed to the peculiar under-water bluish light, the aerial landscape, following the laws of contrast of colors, seems reddish. The fact of the blue rays of light penetrating so much further than those of any other color renders it possible to bring photography to aid the submarine explorer in his investigation as to the real depth that light does succeed in making its way.

The greatest trouble experienced in the use of M. Fol's apparatus comes from the swells, which penetrate to quite a depth and cause him to go swinging about from one spot to another, but, in spite of this, he has faith in his methods and counts confidently upon astonishing the scientific world with his discoveries before the close of the year.

Punishing His Own Folly.

It was at the time of the reaction that set in after the grand rush to Cedar Creek in Montana, a good many years ago. A gentleman was traveling along the road in a light wagon, when he overtook a German with a heavy pack on his back, consisting of blankets, provisions, etc.

"Put your pack in the wagon and get in and ride," said the driver.

The old German shook his head by way of refusal.

"Why won't you ride in preference to walking and carrying that heavy load?" asked the gentleman.

"No, by Jiminy, I won't ride," said the German. "I is going to learn one tam fool Dutchman never to go on another sthampede, py gracious."

Excessive Industry.

Some men work because they love work and hate play. They do not shine in society; they have no conversation; the fair sex are not passing fair to their distorted vision; the whitewashed ceiling of their office and its shabby fittings are more attractive to them than landscapes or Italian skies, and they are under the agreeable thrall of no diverting hobbies. In Heaven's name, let such men work all through the day, if they like it. They accumulate immense fortunes, and even though they may be miserly in their lifetime, when they die some one benefits by their millions.

A man of this kind on an enforced holiday is a very compassionate object. I remember one such, who, while driving through some of the most entrancing scenery of our land on a fair summer day, hid his face behind a journal of the money market all the time. His doctor had told him he would kill himself if he did not take a change. He obeyed the letter of the injunction but not the spirit. And he did really die a little while after of paralysis of the brain, or something of that kind, due to excessive industry.

Our Mistakes About Each Other

Not one man in ten thousand sees the world with whom he associates as they really are. If the prayer of Burns were granted, and we could all see ourselves as others see us, our self estimates would, in all probability, be much more erroneous than they are now. The truth is, that we regard each other through a variety of lenses, no one of which is correct. Passion and prejudice, love and hate, benevolence and envy, spectacle our eyes and utterly prevent us from observing accurately. Many whom we deem the porcelain of human clay are merely pot metal, and a still greater number of those we put down in our "black books" are no further off from heaven, and perhaps a little nearer, than the censors who condemn them. We habitually undervalue or overvalue each other; and in estimating character the shrewdest of us only now and then make true appraisal of the virtues and defects of even our closest intimates. If we all saw ourselves as the world sees us, multitudes would dispense themselves without sufficient cause, and not a few be puffed up with pride for which there would be no honest foundation.

It is not just or fair to look at character from a standpoint of one's own selection. A man's profile may be unprepossessing, and yet his full face agreeable. We once saw a young man whose timidity was a standing joke with his companions, leap into the Hudson and save a boy from drowning, while his tormentors stood panic-stricken on the bank. The merchant who gives curt answers in the counting-room may be a tender husband and father, and a kind helper of the desolate and oppressed. On the other hand, your good humored person, who is all smiles and sunshine in public, may carry something as hard as the nether millstone in the place where his heart ought to be. Such anomalies are common. There is this comfort, however, for those whose misjudgments of their fellow mortals lean to the kindly side—such mistakes lean to their credit in the great account.

He who thinks better of his neighbors than they deserve, is seldom a bad man, for the standard by which his judgment is guided is the goodness of his own heart. It is only the base who believe all men base—or, in other words, like themselves. Few, however, are all evil.

Public men are seldom or never fairly judged—at least while living. However pure, they cannot escape calumny. However corrupt, they are sure to find eulogists. History may do them justice; but they rarely get it while alive, either from friend or foes. —N. Y. Ledger.

When you have spoken the word, it reigns over you; but while it is not yet spoken, you reign over it.

Aesop has told us the tale of a mule which, from overfeeding, galloped about and felt gay, saying to himself: "My father, surely, was a high-mettled racer, and I am his own child in speed and spirit." Next day he was sick and weary; he then exclaimed: "I must have made a mistake; my father, after all, could have been only an ass." A man, after eating a good dinner, may feel extravagantly joyous; but next day (I don't mean you to infer he feels like an ass) he is surly and grim, his stomach and liver are sluggish, he is morose, despondent and "out of sorts" generally. For indigestion, Biliousness and all derangements of the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is an unequalled Remedy. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to ferment and derange the digestive processes. It cleanses the system and cures pimples, blotches, eruptions and all Skin and Scalp Diseases. Scrofulous affections, as Fever-sores, Hip-joint Disease, Swellings and Tumors, yield to its superior alterative properties.

JUNE 23, 1890.

JOHN F. COOPER, Esq.:

Dear Sir—Replying to your letter of the 4th inst., will say that we enclose copy of report of the Mathushek & Son Co., also a copy of the Musical Courier, containing an article relating to these people.

The above mentioned is all the information we have in the matter. It is very evident from the above report that the concern is not in a shape financially to do a very extensive business, but of course rival and unscrupulous dealers will make all they can out of it, in the hope of putting something else forward. It is only another of those desperate attempts to make capital from the name and reputation the Mathushek piano has gained. As a matter of fact it is really gratifying to see how much the name is appreciated, and that it is considered so valuable that previous failures don't seem to dampen the ardor of the projectors. We are confident in the belief, however, from the financial standing of the new concern, that no longer lease of life will be accorded them than was granted their predecessors. The Mathushek Piano is pretty well installed and we hardly think the public will be beguiled into buying a piano made by Jacob Brothers, for a Mathushek. A few may be influenced at first, but it will end like all the other attempts, in a first class advertisement.

Yours very respectfully,

* THE MATHUSHEK PIANO MFG CO.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County.

The people of the State of California,
To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.
By W. W. RHODES, Deputy Clerk.

gt—j12.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, July 9, 1890.

JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. GETT, JR.,
Attorney for Petitioner.

STYLE N

FROM SIG. MARTINEZ, CONCERT SOLO PIANIST.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

Now comes an eminent Berlin physician who protests against coffee drinking as one of the most dangerous intoxicants. The inebriety of coffee, if not as dangerous to others, may be as harmful to the subject as alcoholism, and generally leads to it. Dr. Mendel's studies have covered Germany, but he has given special observation to the great working force in the great gun factories at Essen, where wages are high and employment uninterrupted, and a comparative degree of luxury is within the reach of all. The people of Essen drink immense quantities of coffee, bringing the average for a large portion of them up to a pound a week, many men taking much more than that. The result is a form of neurosis, in which the nerves are disturbed in a degree and manner approaching that which accompanies delirium tremens. Intoxication is followed by gloom and sleeplessness, and about all the disorders characteristic of acute nervous derangement, added to a hate for work. As in the use of alcohol or opium, temporary relief can be had by more and stronger coffee, by tinctures of coffee formed by crushing the berries in spirits; but the cure of a confirmed coffee drunkard is next to unknown, unless the final change to pure alcoholism be counted as a cure. Troubles of this nature are said to be much more widely spread than one would think from the immediate evidence. Most of the stages of excessive coffeeism are too obscure to be apparent. And they are increasing. Tea is merely a weaker agent of the same sort, so that in fact there is no such thing as a cup which cheers without inebriating. Moderation must be the law for tea and coffee as for alcohol.

The tragedy at Howell's, in this county, Sunday, is much to be deplored. It seems that a party of Chinamen had leased an orchard, and that seven of them were engaged in pitting peaches. There had been a misunderstanding between them and a woodchopper over a trivial matter, and it resulted in an altercation between him and one of the Chinamen. The white man was taunted by the farm hands with being afraid of a Chinaman, and a party of whites accompanied him to see him whip the Chinaman. The woodchopper started a quarrel to bring on a fight, and a general melee ensued. The Chinese attacked the white men, and one of the latter was stabbed to death and two others badly cut up. Public opinion, of course, condemned the Chinese, but there may be two sides to the question. If the affair happened as is at this writing represented, the Chinamen were not the aggressors, and it would appear very foolish conduct on the part of the party of whites; and they should have exercised better judgment. There is a disposition with many to tantalize the lower races, and it very frequently happens in this city that a Chinaman when walking along the streets, attending to no one's business but his own, is set upon and beaten. While we wish they were all out of the country, so long as they are here they should not be treated with a brutality that illy becomes our boasted higher civilization. This particular matter is extremely unfortunate, and we sincerely regret it has resulted in the death of an estimable young man. The investigation that will be made will doubtless be full and from it a conclusion can be drawn.

From a recent article, entitled "American Society," written by Mrs. Roger A. Pryor, we extract the following. Mrs. Pryor is the wife of Gen. Roger A. Pryor, the celebrated criminal lawyer of New York. Anterior to the War of the Rebellion, he was a resident of Virginia, of which State he was a native, and one of whose districts he represented with great distinction for several terms. On the breaking out of the war he was made a Brigadier General, and in that capacity served his side with courage and bravery. Since that time he has been a resident of New York city, where he has built up an immense practice, especially in the criminal branch of the profession and has amassed vast wealth. Mrs. Pryor, also a Virginian, in her youthful days was a leader in Washington and Virginia society, but is now, of course, too advanced in life to be any longer active in the social circle, yet is able from the height she has attained, and the experience through which she has passed, and the disinterested situation of her quiet and retired life, to treat of her subject as only the gifted and true American lady is able to write. She says:

It is because of the restless, aspiring element, and the ambition for foreign style and fashion conflicting with American exuberance and naturalness, that society here is a never-ending source of curiosity to foreigners. It has no fixed national stamp like its prototype in every other country. The presence of a court always determines the status of society. We have no court, and yet we must crystalize around some centre.

What shall it be? We have no order of nobility to prescribe the ton to the plebeian crowd. In this destitution of artificial and arbitrary models the danger is lest mere vulgar wealth with its profusion of barbaric display shall furnish our ideals of admiration and imitation. Why may we not, from our own resources and under the inspiration of our own peculiar genius, create a system of social arrangement and intercourse, of which the fundamental principle shall be moral excellence and intellectual superiority—expressed through customs and manners in accordance with republican simplicity.

"When we consider society as it now exists in this country we are impressed with its marvellous opportunities for acquiring knowledge and elegant culture. Nothing hampers it. It makes no end of voyages and journeys. It is able to drink at every fountain of learning, beauty and art. It is rich—very rich; it can bring home treasures from the libraries, tapestries and furnishings from ancient palaces, and paintings from European galleries. It has leisure and can command instruction in every art of speech or manner or accomplishment known to the civilized world. The politeness of Paris, the erudition of Germany, the mystic fables of the East, the legends of haunted castles—all these and more are at its command to give it light and color. Is it not reasonable that we should look to the "society" of this metropolis (New York) of millionaires, as the perfect flower of social life in the nineteenth century? Is it too much to wish that its fragrance may be diffusive, reaching and encircling those whose lot in life is less opulent? We know that it does in many beautiful charities enrich the world around it. There are names among the wealthy people of this metropolis that are never withheld from any good work, nor ever refused when asked as guarantee for benevolent claims upon the public.

There is a large and growing class in this city (New York)—larger than in other American cities—which owes its social prominence solely to the sudden accumulation of wealth.

This is the class so offensive at summer resorts, in their arrogance and rudeness, that respectable people are tempted to fly to the caves and fastnesses of the earth to escape them. Their manners are stamped with certain peculiarities which cause their immediate recognition. On no account, for instance, will they evince the smallest consciousness of any individual who may not be in their set.

Our costly and elaborate social machinery does really accomplish nothing more than the formal payment of society debts, or the display of wealth, or the spending of time in puerile amusements. Could it not be made, this great force, a powerful agent in the moral and intellectual advancement, as well as in the amusement and recreation of the community. The whole matter lies in the hands of the gentlemen of this country.

I hardly know of a more enviable position than that of a recognized leader in society; her opportunity for setting a high standard is so large, her influence so commanding. She can direct public opinion toward a recognition of true beauty, mental and moral. As we have no court, no military heroes, no great philosophers or poets around whom we may organize society, is it too much to suggest that character be with us, as intellect was in the French salons, the central idea?

If our society queens could give, with noble unselfishness, thought and time to this subject and act intelligently upon it, who can estimate the result? They must create their own ideas. Prophets crying in the wilderness, ascetics on their pillars, have never a message that society will heed.

Nothing lovelier can be found
In woman, than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote.

In conversation with a well known gentleman recently, concerning the graduation of his daughter from an institution of learning, he expressed the natural gratification of a parent at her success, and added: "There is one thing in her I particularly pride. She is an excellent cook and knows all about running a house." More there is in that remark than many parents and many of our young ladies seem to appreciate. The girl who understands how to properly conduct a house is in demand, and can make her choice of a husband. As a general proposition she has the good sense to select one from whom she will not be separated by the divorce courts, and with whom she will live happily until death parts them. Mistakes in matters matrimonial will of course occur under circumstances seemingly the most favorable, but in many cases divorces come because of the incapacity of the wife to administer the affairs of the household, and because she forgets she has a duty to perform as well as her consort, and one of equal importance. To him is assigned the obligation to make proper provision; to her that of attending to the hive. A woman reared in affluence has no guarantee that business reverses may not come; it has happened to very many. When the black cloud overshadows, if she possesses the knowledge of domestic economy she should have, she will be in a position to help her companion, and if necessary to personally run her home. If wealth take not wings she, if possessing the knowledge, will see that her subordinates properly perform their service. With most of us the wife has to do her own housework, and particularly should she be skilled in her trade. A sensible young man pays much more attention than many of the girls imagine to the qualities that guarantee a good housekeeper, and the maiden who can prepare a good meal and satisfactorily manage, has no need to pace the streets fishing for a beau, and after she mates will have no occasion to appreciate the sentiment of Hood:

But alas! alas! for the woman's fate,
Who has from a mob to choose a mate!
'Tis a strange and painful mystery!
But the more the eggs, the worse the hatch;
The more the fish, the worse the catch;
The more the sparks, the worse the match;
Is a fact in woman's history.

The habits of our great men in the United States are decidedly at war with the laws of life and health, and of this I have no doubt they are in a great measure ignorant; for they were not taught, either in childhood, youth, or manhood, that life has any determinate laws, or that health can be secured with any certainty by obedience to such laws. Thus they live loosely, and oftener than otherwise find themselves the possessors of habits and tastes which hold great force over them, and oftentimes press them into courses decidedly adverse to their judgments. It is a difficult thing to find a man in this country who, by the force of his own talent has risen to such position as to be entitled great, who is in good health. Generally speaking, the diseases or illnesses to which they are subject are of such a character as to indicate bad dietetic habits and overtaxed brains, thus relating them to life and the powers which they show, at such a point as to render it, in their view, at least, decidedly necessary that they should take daily into their systems, in some form or other, substances whose effects, when introduced, are stimulating. Almost all our great men drink alcoholic beverages, some of the milder, and some of the stronger kind; and, in addition to this, nearly all of them are in the habitual, daily use of tea and coffee as table beverages. To this, also, may be added the use of tobacco in some of its forms, and in many instances in all its forms. Some smoke, chew, and take snuff; others chew and take snuff; others smoke and take snuff. Our politicians of the smaller stripe, almost all of them chew tobacco. Those of a little larger caliber smoke, and our greatest men in this country, especially those who have been in public life, take snuff. There were only a few Senators in the Senate of the United States, at its last session, who did not take snuff. Many of them have already taken it until its legitimate effect has been produced in the destruction of their natural tones of voice. It is said that Senator Seward spoiled his voice by the foolish habit of taking snuff. Senator Benton spoiled his in the same manner, and Henry Clay's was very much damaged. Nearly all of our great men are hard workers with their brains, and they find sustaining power in intrinsic force instead of finding it in intrinsic vitality. They give themselves minimum quantities of rest; they eat without much regularity; they sleep with no exactness or precision; and so, by the time that they should be at their maximum degree of intellectual development, most of them are broken down. Thinking men in this country break down more rapidly than laboring men. They make larger drafts on the vital force, without any of those auxiliary recuperations which life in the open air and muscular exercise furnish. A simpler method of living would do much to extend the longevity of thinking men. In various ways they might improve their habits. They might eat much simpler food than they do; they might take more exercise in the open air; they might secure for themselves larger installments of sleep; they might, in many respects, better arrange the expenditures of which they are under the necessity of making in order to succeed in their professions, to the life forces which they really possess. Living as they do, they naturally fall, in the course of time, into the hands of the doctors; and we cannot conceive of a greater misfortune happening to one whose success depends upon his having all his powers at his command, than falling into the hands of a demonstrator of drugs. O! this eternal druggery! This constantly taking into a man's stomach something to ruin his brains, is horribly wicked. This everlasting violation of the commonest principles of life, and the attempt to substitute for the losses thus accruing, results that will be decidedly recuperative, through the use of medical poisons, should not be tolerated. That our great men live under the circumstances which surround them, to so great an age as they do, by no means proves that their course of life is right. It only proves that, with all its drawbacks, nature has been exceedingly generous in giving them large measures of vitality. In addition, it proves that they might live much longer than they do, if they did but recognize the authority of nature, and address themselves to their tasks and their pursuits, in honesty and with generous simplicity. It is painful to see how many of our great men die in their bloom, how many of them die when they only have begun to live.

CHEERFULNESS.

Cheerfulness is the sunshine of the soul, and the pleasing influence is not confined to self, but it diffuses happy light and genial warmth to the domestic and social circles. It is a true and inward joy, an agreeable and sober emotion, which, while it banishes melancholy, is readily distinguished from mirth, that oft, like lightning, breaks through the gloom, dazzles for a moment, when all becomes dark again. Merriment is transient and often spasmodic, but cheerfulness is a permanent and glowing serenity of mind. The man who enjoys this happy disposition, is not only felicitous in his thoughts, but he controls his temper, and his impulses become amiable; while he feels a prevailing gratitude to the Giver of all good for the many blessings that have been vouchsafed to him. His family rejoice in the sunshine of his smile, and his friends unconsciously and irresistibly partake in his presence, of that galvanic, but agreeable excitement, which with a mysterious mental sympathy, speeds like electricity from soul to soul, through groups and even entire congregations of the human family. Thus the cheerful man is a living fountain of good humor to those of his fellow beings with whom he may come in contact. His imagination is clear, his judgment undisturbed by ungenerous, suspicious, or bigoted prejudices. He looks at the world with a hopeful, if not laughing eye, sees chiefly the bright side of things, chases away the dismal visions and specters that haunt the idler's fancy, labors with contentment, and enjoys the fruit of his toil with an exquisite relish. He pries not into the flying scandals of the hour that may involve his friends, and ridicules or lives down the calumnies that affect himself—thus disarming the point and eye of slanderous weapons, and rendering their venom innocuous. Good-will is the general sentiment felt towards him—for he is affable and obliging, qualities that are not usually reciprocated by all with whom he converses—and whether in business or pleasure, has a kindly effect upon the hearts of acquaintances, elicits a strong friendship and a mutuality of amicable emotions. Indeed, cheerfulness may be regarded as a most manifest sign of wisdom. For as in our lives, so in our studies and thoughts, it is becoming and prudent to temper this faculty with gravity, in order that the mind may not be filled with mournful ideas and sad forebodings. This virtue which is so universally admired, infers an acquaintance in the decrees of Providence, and a desire to dispense, as far as in our power lies, additional happiness to all around, and a measurable contentment with our conditions of life. We are not only happy if good-humored ourselves, but we are anxious that our friends should likewise partake of the serene pleasure that we experience. Proneness to melancholy is the sad condition of many men. They regard the present with dissatisfaction, and view the future—always an imaginary future—with alarm. They look forward to their coming destiny as replete with woe, and dwell upon pictures of improbable ruin conjured up by a morbidly creative fancy, with such terrible tenacity, that their minds are enveloped in gloom, and thus they first give way to a nervous despondency, then to blank despair, which not unfrequently conducts the unhappy victim to suicide. With such doleful persons, who are constantly supposing and building up in their fantastic brains, what they conceive to be insurmountable and inevitable obstacles, but which have no real existence, either present or prospective—the conversation of a cheerful companion dispenses the balm of an awakened felicity, and kindles the pure flame of hope; and then the heart of the hypochondriac becomes softened and brightened. He sees his condition and prospects in gay and more vivid colors, and while he resolves to arouse his faculties from the depressive nightmare of sickly fancies, he soon finds that—

"Hope, like a glimmering taper's light,
Adorns and cheers the way;
And still, as darker grows the night,
Emits a brighter ray."

How important, then, and how gratifying also, will ever be the endeavors of all who encourage a cheerfulness of disposition. It is a faculty that will banish from the soul all that secret heaviness and vain sorrow, which many men are liable to, who labor under no real affliction. It deprives the unavoidable evils and adversities of life of half their bitterness, and is a treasury even in hours of severe and multiplied trials, like Pandora's box, a casket full of ills, with hope at the bottom—and so are the ills counteracted. Cheerfulness promotes virtue, represses vice, and improves temper. Properly appreciated it will be recognized as a portion of the "Divinity that stirs within us."

The Army of the Potomac Defended.

At the late army reunion at Portland, Maine, General Sherman, in a very clever speech, made a comparison between his troops as they marched through Washington in the grand review after the war, rather disparaging to the soldierly qualities of the Army of the Potomac. To this badinage of the old General the editor of the Rochester Post-Express responds as follows:

Let us repeat now what we have said heretofore—that the common delusion about the superiority of the western armies in the civil war has no foundation whatsoever. It is due to pure brag and bluster. The corps (the Second) that did the heaviest fighting and suffered the heaviest loss during the war was in the Army of the Potomac; the division (the first of that corps) that did the heaviest fighting and suffered the heaviest loss was in the Army of the Potomac; the brigade (a western one) that suffered the greatest percentage of fighting loss was in the Army of the Potomac; the regiment (an eastern one) that suffered the heaviest fighting loss was in the Army of the Potomac; the division, brigade and regiment that suffered the heaviest loss in a single engagement was in the Army of the Potomac; and the regiment that suffered the greatest percentage of loss in the war (a western one) and the greatest percentage of loss in a single action (a western one also) were in the Army of the Potomac. Out of forty-five Union regiments that suffered a loss of more than 200 killed in action very few were in the western armies. The simple fact of the matter is that the western armies, though sorely tried at Shiloh and Chicamauga, were never put to the fighting pressure which the Army of the Potomac had to sustain.

OPERATING ON ROYALTY.

A Romance Showing the Disadvantages of Surgery on the Shah's Wife—How the Shah of Persia First Encountered Her.

[Vienna Correspondence.]

There is a vast contrast between the travels of the Shah and those of his wife—or one of his wives. When he came to Europe there were elaborate advance notices for months, as though a prima donna or a circus were on its way hither. When the actual advent was achieved it was in the very focused center of the "sunlight of publicity," and he could scarcely sneeze or yawn without the momentous episode being chronicled throughout the world. But when one of his wives—one of the favorites, too—came hither, it was in silence and by stealth. No one knew she was coming, and only a very few knew that she had come until she had been here for some time.

The public sees her not, nor knows aught of her doings, and when she returns to Iran the journey will be made privately and without the knowledge of the world. When she reached this city she remained in her railway carriage until every one else had left the train and the station had been cleared. Then she was led, or rather carried, by her negro attendants to a waiting room, where she was received by the ladies of the Persian Embassy and conducted by them to the Legation. With the exception of these ladies and Prof. Fuchs, the great oculist, and Prof. Mauthner, she has come in contact with no one here.

It would not be correct to say that these are the only persons she has seen, for she has not yet seen them. She was entirely blind when she arrived here, save that with one eye she could perceive the faintest glimmer of light, and it was in the hope of having her sight at least partially restored that she came to Vienna. Col. Sellers was quite right. The teeming millions of Asia are suffering with sore eyes. This imperial patient began such suffering some four or five years ago. At that time her right eye was attacked by primary glaucoma. The disease, which consists of or is caused by certain degenerative processes of the blood vessels of the eye, is generally confined to old people. The Sultana, however, is now only about forty-two years old. The Persian doctors could do nothing for her, and she became totally blind in that eye. Then the malady spread to the left eye and destroyed its sight. As she is his favorite wife, the Shah was terribly distressed, and finally determined to pursue the unprecedented course of sending her to Europe to be treated by the most skillful oculists she could find.

Prof. Fuchs was the surgeon chosen, and he, assisted by Prof. Mauthner, operated on her. She was put under the influence of an anesthetic and iridectomy was performed. This consisted of nothing less than cutting out a portion of the eyeball, a very delicate and dangerous operation, as any one can see. It appears, however, to have been entirely successful, and the doctors are confident that she will be able to see fairly well with that eye. The other eye, which was first affected, is hopelessly blind. It will, however, be some weeks before the bandages are removed and she is allowed to test the results of the operation, and she will remain at Frazenbad, where she has taken a villa for a month or more, before returning to the harem of the King of Kings. Prof. Fuchs is said to have received $5,000 for performing the operation and Prof. Mauthner $3,000. The court physicians at Teheran, who advised the visit to Vienna, were closely locked up at the time of her departure and will not be liberated until she returns safely. If she dies from any untoward results of the operation, or through any disaster of travel, they will promptly be put to death.

This lady is one of the akdees, or regular wives of the Shah. Under Mahomedan law not more than four such companions are allowed, and Nasr-ed-Deen has only three. One of them is his aunt and another his cousin, the latter being the one who has come to Vienna. The third wife was formerly the Shah's favorite seegeh, or supernumerary wife—a species of relation of whom the Shah has usually about forty on hand at a time. She was the daughter of a poor countryman living near Demavend. One day the Shah chanced to pass through the village and she went to the roadside and offered him a basket of grapes and pomegranates. He stopped, took the fruit and then commanded her to remove her veil that he might see her face—a privilege which he alone can exercise over any woman in Persia. She of course complied.

Doubtless she had expected that to happen when she went out with the fruit. At that time she was an uncommonly pretty girl, even for a Persian, and the tender and unsophisticated heart of the Shah was profoundly impressed. He probably had not been in love more than two or three thousand times before, so he was still quite a novice. The upshot of it was that the next day found the miller's daughter (no relation to Tennyson's girl of the same name) installed in the imperial harem as favorite seegeh, with a promise that just as soon as there was a vacant akdeeship she should be promoted to fill it. Several years passed before there was such a vacancy, but when one did occur the Shah fulfilled his promise. The former peasant girl had continued to make good use of her opportunities by getting a dozen or more of her relatives appointed to lucrative places at the imperial court. Two of her brothers are chamberlains and another is marshal of her household. But a fourth brother refused all such honors and emoluments and still drives his humble trade as a muleteer.

The Shah became a father at the age of 16 years; wherefore his eldest children are now well advanced in life. His eldest daughter is nearly 45 years old, and is called the Glory of Kings. She married the son of the Master of the Mint, one of the richest men in Persia. When the Master died, however, the Shah took possession of the bulk of his fortune. Naturally, the son-in-law felt himself ill-treated, and failing to obtain any redress, he left Persia and went to Paris. There he distinguished himself by the utter recklessness of his career, until his imperial father-in-law, for very shame, recalled him and gave him what was left of his inheritance. He had previously been married to the adopted daughter of Mme. Hadji Abbas, a clever French woman whom Hadji Abbas, the court painter, married in Paris and took to Teheran, at the request of the ladies of the harem, to teach them the fine art of millinery. The second daughter of the Shah, called the Light of the Empire, is the wife of Gen. Yusef Khad. Numbers three and four, the Pride of the Empire and the Purity of the Empire, are married; the one to a high court official, the other to the Chief Priest of Teheran. All the eight grown-up daughters of the Shah, indeed, have made good matches.

They have, perhaps, made better matches than their husbands. For it is not altogether profitable to be a son-in-law of the Shah. A princess spends much, and her carriages and runner, her many servants, and the lavish entertainments she is obliged to give to other princesses, generally cost much more than the $10,000 per annum which the Shah gives as a dowry. The Shah, too, is more apt to take anything from a son-in-law than from a stranger, or a person not related to him. And another drawback is, that the husband of a Shah's daughter loses more or less of his liberty, cannot take other wives, and must do as his wife pleases. The only one, perhaps, of the Shah's sons-in-law who has kept his liberty, is the Chief Priest of Teheran. He is able to bring religion to bear on the subject; can possibly justify anything he does by the Koran and traditions, and has the clergy, with their enormous influence, to back him up.

One Estimate.

In the columns of her own paper, Kate Field's Washington, the editor thus comments on the "Kreutzer Sonata":

Be it Tolstoi or Posdnicheff that speaks, there is an awful lot of truth in the "Kreutzer Sonata."

"The absence of the rights of women does not consist in the fact that she has not the right to vote, or the right to sit on the bench; but in the fact that in her affectional relations she is not the equal of man—she has not the right to choose instead of being chosen."

Women suffragists, here is the key to the situation, and you don't seem to know it. You hold conventions for the elevation of women, and a Russian murderer shows you the way.

"In the name of love, man kills half the human race. Of women, who ought to be his aid in the movement of humanity toward liberty, he makes not an aid, but an enemy. Who is it that everywhere puts a check upon the progressive movement of humanity? Woman. * * * See the Jews. With their power of money they avenge their subjection, just as women do. 'Ah! you wish us to be only merchants? All right; remaining merchants, we will get possession of you,' say the Jews. 'Ah! you wish us to be only objects of sensuality? We will bend you beneath our yoke,' say the women."

Well, is it not so? Does not the great, persecuted Hebrew race control the finances of the world to-day? Are not the Posdnicheffs the victims of their own slaves? Man is the fly, woman is the spider. He, being the stronger brute in all these past generations, has so willed it. Hence, as Posdnicheff declares, "every sort of feminine education has for its sole object the attraction of men. * * * From infancy, garments, ornaments, cleanliness, grace, dances, music, reading of poetry, novels, singing, the theater, the concert, etc. With that, complete physical idleness, an excessive care of the body, a vast consumption of sweetmeats. * * * Woman's whole life is spent in preparations for coquetry, or in coquetry itself."

Dare you deny this statement, so far as the upper classes are concerned? Dare you deny the arraignment that follows? "Compare the wretched, the despised, with the women of the highest society; the same dresses, the same fashions, the same perfumeries, the same passion for jewelry, etc. The former attract by all possible means, so do the latter. No difference."

Do you believe that the time will ever arrive when mothers will be ashamed to "bring out" their daughters? According to Posdnicheff, what does a rosebud really mean?

"As woman cannot make advances herself, there begins that other and more abnormal lie which is sometimes called going into society, sometimes amusing oneself, and which is really nothing but the hunt for a husband. * * * We males walk up and down and estimate the merchandise, and then we discourse upon the rights of women, etc."

And, pray, what is the character of the men who sit or stand in judgment on their spiders?

Says Posdnicheff: "When we enter a parlor or a ball-room, washed, shaven and perfumed, with very white linen, etc., as emblems of purity, oh, the disgust. There will surely come a time, an epoch, when all these lives and all this cowardice will be unvailed."

Undoubtedly; but not until woman ceases to be a spider. Posdnicheff anticipates several generations when he states that, "woman, in bringing a child into the world, sees clearly that her affair is more serious than the affair of man, who sits in the court. She knows that in these functions the main thing is money, and money can be made in different ways, and for that very reason money is not inevitably necessary, like nursing a child. Consequently, woman is necessarily superior to man, and must rule. But man, in our society, not only does not recognize this, but, on the contrary, always looks upon her from the height of his grandeur, despising what she does."

The Indian despises the squaw; the squaw teaches her son to command, her daughter to serve. The white woman is not so many removes from the squaw as she gets the credit of being. She does not, as a rule, appreciate the greatness of her mission. She feels her chains, she revolts at her subjection, she wants to be a man in order to be free. God help us all so long as this rotten condition of society endures! The woman of the future will not want to be a man. The mother of the future will demand one code of morals for both sexes.

Then there will be no spiders and no Posdnicheffs.

And Tolstoi's occupation will be gone.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

There must be a high appreciation of dramatic art in Leadville. A clipping from a Leadville paper reads: "Even Edwin Booth received no greater ovation and warmer welcome in Leadville than did Bobby Gaylor, the Irish comedian."

Fanny Davenport was the guest recently of Sardou, at his country home, Morly le Roi. Mme. Sardou and her daughter, M. Dumas, fils, M. Monan, M. Massenet, Mlle. Bianca, Melbourne McDowell, and other guests sat down to a magnificent breakfast given in honor of the American actress. Some of the great author's famed wines were drunk, among which the noted port, given him by the king of Portugal. Miss Davenport sails for America July 30th, to prepare for her coming season in a production of Cleopatra.

The following conversation was overheard the other evening at the Madison Square Theater, between a young lady and her escort: "I want to applaud, but the acting was so wonderfully good, that for the moment the scene was real, and I could not." "I am glad you could not," replied the lady, "it would have seemed like impertinence." The observer of Mansfield's play is not willing to lose one look, gesture, word or tone, for each has its own value—each is needed for the full expression of the character. Hence, there is seldom any applause except at the fall of the curtain, when the actor is always recalled.

Book Chat.

Charles Dickens, the younger, wears spectacles, is getting bald, and works as hard as any other literary laborer in London; he has a considerable mustache, and, in addition to editing All the Year Round, contributes largely to other periodicals and makes it pay; he is on kindly terms with all the literary celebrities of the day, and says the aim of his life is to bring back Gad's Hill into his family if he can raise the money.

In a literary contest organized by a London penny paper as to the most popular writer of fiction, Miss Braddon received 1,808 votes against the 1,648 of Rider Haggard. Our own Frances Hodgson Burnett received less than 200 and Edna Lyall but 327. Walter Besant ranks third in the list. William Black, Robert Louis Stevenson and Marion Crawford called forth but few admiring votes, and George Meredith was not mentioned. At a recent canvass of Coney Island hotels the palm was voted to Brooklyn's fair novelist, Laura Jean Libbey.

A typographical error has been discovered in the last issue of the bible from the Cambridge press. It occurs in Isaiah xiviii, 13, the word "foundation" being begun by an "r" instead of an "f." The young son of Dr. Adler found the error and received the standing reward of a guinea. Years ago there was an addition of the bible known as the "bad bible," from the fact that the word "not" was omitted from the most important commandment. The unfortunate printer was tried for his life and the whole edition confiscated and suppressed.

If there is any one thing in modern fiction more pitiable than another, it is the condition of the heroine of the popular novel. She has been slighted. In this age of character drawing she is left utterly without one. Thomas, the butler, may have a character—in fact, he is pounced upon by the idealist as a type, but Helen, upon whom he waits, is left with the meager description that "she was a mere slip of a girl blushing like a dewy rose in the morning sunlight," or "a queen of a woman with nut brown hair." Nothing more. If she ever does anything it is to play into the hands of the villain like the perfect simpleton that she is. As a rule, although she loves Reginald, she fondly and idiotically imagines that he is false and becomes engaged to the villain a dozen times before the last chapter, because she believes, although she has no reason to do so, that she has wronged him. If, on the other hand, the hero be in reality a disgusting brute, although placed in a glamor of romance by the novelist, she loves him almost as much as she does her box of bonbons, and sticks to him as faithfully as a porous plaster does to a fat man. In a word, she is totally without character—totally uninteresting.

Professional Chat.

Some men have acute greatness, while others have it in a chronic form.

"The instant you have uttered all the thoughts you have in mind, sit down." This advice, strictly followed, would keep a man sitting down faster than he could get up.

There is a Congressman who is noted at his home for sustained effort as well as ability in oratory. "I consider him a very able man," said a railroad official, in speaking of him, "but there is one thing his speeches seem to lack." "What?" "Proper terminal facilities."

A clergyman says: "I once married a young couple, and as I took the bride by the hand at the close of the ceremony, and gave her my warmest congratulations, she tossed her pretty head, and pointing to the bridegroom, said: 'I think he is the one to be congratulated.'"

"When I was a younger man I was a political speaker," said Counsellor Park, of Aurora, to a Chicago Tribune reporter. "My father was living in Waukegan during the presidential campaign in which General Grant was the nominee of the Republican party, and Horace Greeley the nominee of the 'Liberal Republicans,' indorsed by the Democrats. I was on a campaign tour in Wisconsin, if I remember rightly. I had an audience on the occasion to which I now call your attention, that was with me in my sentiments. When I had reached the warming-up point of my speech, I said that every eminent man who had lived, or was living, had uttered some words that would live forever. In proof, I quoted from Cæsar's veni, vidi, vici, down to Grant's, 'I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer.' Having arrayed these sayings of great men, I stood on tiptoe and asked with oratorical anguish: 'What did Greeley ever say?' There was a hush on the heels of this inquiry that lasted until it was painful to me. As I was about to proceed, a little man with fiery red hair arose in a back seat in the building, and answered in a shrill voice: 'Go west, — — — you.' The audience howled and yelled, and fairly rolled from their seats. I didn't finish my speech. The red-haired man who had unwittingly punctured my oratory had broken up the meeting."

"Speaking of literal obedience," observed Judge Hixley, of Denver, to a Chicago Post reporter, "speaking of literal obedience, I once had a bailiff in my court who would bow in that respect to no one. Expecting one afternoon that my wife would call on me in my chamber to sign some papers, I instructed my bailiff to admit no one. A short time afterward I heard some one try the inner door, and then the quick steps of my bailiff hurrying to intercept an entrance. There was a lady's voice, which I recognized as my wife's, whom I supposed the bailiff knew, inquiring for me. But the bailiff didn't know her. 'His honor is in,' I heard him say, 'but you can't see him. You see, madam, he gave me strict orders not to let any ladies into his chambers this afternoon, because (in a stage whisper) his wife is coming,' and he slammed the door. I hastened to the door to set things right, but when I opened it my wife was going down the steps, and, though I called, she would not return. That evening she ate her supper in silence, and not until the wee sma' hours of the morn was I able to square myself." "What became of the bailiff?" Clerk Kennedy inquired. "The bailiff," replied the Judge, "the bailiff, as we say in politics, resigned."

NOTES.

It seems now that the American hog will be compelled to have a certificate of medical experts in order to gain admission into Europe. Some of the biped hogs that go over there should be denied admission even with certificates.

Our next Legislature will do a good thing by revising or repealing the dead letter laws now on the statute books. In many instances we have too many incomprehensible laws. Too much law, like too much gin, is not good.

The census returns show the following populations: Alameda, 92,188; Amador, 10,490; Alpine, 655; Calaveras, 8,820; Contra Costa, 12,874; El Dorado, 8,878; Nevada, 17,167; Placer, 14,986; Sacramento, 40,505; San Joaquin, 28,252; Tuolumne, 6,073.

The professional genius has gone and discovered somewhere among his inner works that Fremont was a German, and his real name Fremuth. He was the sort of German that is born in Georgia, with a Frenchman for his father and a Virginian for his mother.

It now develops that the delay in starting the work on the new Postoffice building was occasioned by the illness of the architect. Congressman McKenna has at length pressed the case so strong that we will have action taken towards letting contracts for a portion of the work on August 7th.

A little jest sometimes takes on a big and earnest meaning. When the gay crowds of young people boarded the Sea Wing on Lake Pepin that fatal day of tempest, a girl laughingly fastened on a life preserver and insisted on likewise decorating her lover, remarking they were really now for anything that happened. The girl's thoughtless joke saved both their lives.

James Gordon Bennett is in Paris watching Gardner Howland "tool" the Magnet; Joseph Pulitzer is in Paris paying big prices to unavailing oculists; Whitelaw Reid is in Paris attending to the business of a nation; and Charles A. Dana is on the high seas, bound for Paris and a good time. Meanwhile the daily newspapers come out with regularity, and no one knows who makes them.

It is no new thing to hear of dissensions in the Democratic ranks—that they are ready to fight and knife one another. But just show them a chance to win, and somehow they get together and in unity with remarkable alacrity. They are like cats in many respects. We hear a great noise and much howling, as though they were destroying each other; but it results in "more cats."

Always just after a convention we are admonished with alarm, by some of our eminent statesmen who are sulking in their tents, that the whole country is just going to the demnition bow wows. These local guardians of government not having been allowed a voice in affairs, think the destinies of the country hung upon them, and the people having gone contrary to their notions of prosperity, predict all manner of disasters.

There are some blunt, outspoken men who will tell the truth no matter who is hurt. One of these blunt old fellows took occasion to pronounce against some of the fashionable sins and follies which struck home on his people. A delegation was appointed to wait on the old fellow to remonstrate against such doctrines. He made a quick and forcible response, saying: "Then behave yourselves." This answer would fit our Democratic Congressmen from the South who complain of the Federal Election Bill.

The little four-year old son of one of our leading business men, is a rival of the great bear story tellers. The youngster went with his father to his ranch in El Dorado county, recently, where there are plenty of jack-rabbits. The youngster became greatly excited at the spectacle of so many jack-rabbits, and one day he came running to his mother, saying: "I just killed twenty-seven jack-rabbits at one shot—all at one shot." His mother was shocked at the yarn, and asked him how he could tell such a story. "Yes, I did," said the youthful nimrod, "yes, I did; all with one shot; just twenty-seven jack-rabbits."

It is said that some prophetic professor of Harvard University has calculated the horoscope based upon astrological observations taken at the time of Stanley's marriage. "At the time Venus, the significator of love and wedding, was evilly aspected by Saturn and Mars, and the moon was in a terrible dilemma. There will be trouble, discord and unhappiness, even death being feared. The couple will find their temperaments so different as to cause, sooner or later, aversions which will aggravate the explorer's ill health. He will take a sea voyage shortly, and his experience will go a long way toward proving marriage a failure."

In most government matters there is a miserly policy adopted. Now comes complaints of the inadequate sums allowed for surveying public lands, which in late years has resulted in poor and inaccurate work. The Postoffice Department is another illustration of this scant allowance, and which is only an invitation to commit crime. Carriers are paid from $30 to $50 per month, which is but a temptation to steal when opportunity offers. In the taking of the late census, we find a striking example of parsimony in the compensation of the enumerators. Many of these officers scarcely made expenses, not to count their time. A great and rich government like the United States should not permit this. Indeed most of the Federal officers are poorly paid. It is only in matters of government contracts that we find liberality. An illustration is manifest by the work on the Payne break in the Sacramento river, where it is the open boast that several parties have reaped rich harvests of coin at the expense of the nation.

Political.

Campaigns in this county are all about alike, and every two years history repeats itself. There is the same primary struggle in the Republican party, the same contentions in the convention, the same crop of sore heads among those who have been defeated, the same prediction from them that the successful candidates had better look out, but there will be the same general ending—success on election day.

In the present instance the Republicans have nominated a ticket that is exceptionally good, and is so conceded by the thinking voters. As usual, however, portions or all of it are combatted by the few who have been consistent in that they kick against everything they do not absolutely control; and the chronic office seekers who were not successful in securing nominations are entering their usual protest. It would seem the more the party does for some men the more they want, and they forget there are others who should be given a chance at the public crib, and to receive political honors. We have made a careful inquiry to ascertain the feeling of the people, and find a more general sentiment of satisfaction with the nominations than was manifested concerning any other ticket that has been placed in the field for years past.

We regret very much that Mr. Hamilton followed the very bad advice given him to run as an independent candidate for County Clerk, and are satisfied had he acted from his own promptings he would have determined differently. We have been for many years the principal of another subordinate arm of the Courts, and have had intimate official and personal relations with him. A friendship of years' standing exists, and we cannot say otherwise than that he is an honest and estimable gentleman. His only fault lies in the fact that he is too good-hearted, tries to please everybody, and lacks firmness in the conduct of his office. It resulted in some instances in serious loss to clients in important cases, and that, more than anything else brought about his defeat for renomination. Lawyers of prominence, whose clients had suffered, demanded a change, and urged the present candidate to present his name before the convention. Mr. Hamilton certainly must have understood these matters, as they were on more than one occasion presented to the courts in matters in which he was a witness. The fact that he did not appear before the convention would indicate that he realized their force. The nomination of Mr. Rhoads came about fairly; and Mr. Hamilton will not say to the people that Mr. Rhoads is not an honest, faithful, and industrious officer, fully competent to discharge the duties of the office. We have not space to now dwell further on this subject; in fact, it is not necessary, as it will be dealt with later on in the campaign, through the press and on the stump.

Gov. Waterman is again emphatic in declaring that under no consideration will he be a candidate for Governor. The contest seems to be narrowing down to Morrow and Markham, though Gen. Chipman and Shippee have strong followings.

We have read with interest the remarks of Hon. Grove L. Johnson, relative to the scenes of disturbance at the Third Ward polls at the primary, and appreciate their force and truth. We have had too much of this thing, and have known of instances where a reputable citizen had to cast his vote vi et armis, and where he had been challenged by hired ruffians, whose clothing still emitted the smell of the prison. We cannot, perhaps, blame these tools so much as those who employ them. We hope some day to see an organization of the better element that will cooperate with the officers to suppress this evil. Here is an instance Mr.

Johnson cites as having occurred at the primary referred to:

"One man, apparently the leader, is a person who was under arrest at that time, and is under bonds now to appear and answer to a very serious charge before your Honor. He was at the window challenging voters and endeavoring to intimidate voters. He was requested by an honest and efficient public servant—officer Prazee—to desist, but he refused."

While it is perhaps true that any one has a right to challenge, yet the Board of Election should have ordered the removal of men of that character, and compelled the enforcement of the 100-foot rule. If the latter law was strictly enforced, much of this trouble would be stopped.

The Re-registration.

At the time the matter was broached to re-register the voters of this county, and to cast aside the costly data that was collected two years ago, we called attention to the law concerning cancellations, and pointed out that if it were followed much expense would be saved, citizens would not be disfranchised, and the existing register would be thoroughly purified. It must be recollected that political committees, in all these matters, exercise such surveillance that it will be impossible that any particular number of names will be voted fraudulently; each party will, through its business management, satisfy itself that the ballots will be cast by the right men. Had the register been permitted to stand, legal cancellations made, removals noted, and those entitled to register added, much trouble and expense would have been obviated, and the work would have proceeded in the perfect system the law contemplates. We do not know the percentage of changes from the existing noted residences, but believe it to be slight. At the ending some very interesting statistics can be made:

1. The number of citizens whose names and residences are the same on both the old and new register, and who of course needed no new registration, and have simply been subjected to inconvenience and loss of time.

2. The number of citizens who have removed their residence from one precinct to another within the county, and who would, of course, be required to indicate that fact.

3. The number of names of persons who have been dropped, and an application of the law to their cases as to how many would have been dropped had its provisions been strictly complied with.

4. The number of original registrations, that is, twenty-onesters, those newly naturalized, and those who have moved into the county. They would have to be registered in any event.

5. The number of citizens who are in every respect entitled to vote, but who, through misapprehension or absence from the county failed to get on the register. We are informed that before the new register was opened, but after it was ordered, some of the deputy assessors in the country sent in a number of registrations of young men and of persons who had acquired a legal right to vote in this county, but their applications have been refused at the Clerk's office; properly of course, under the Board of Supervisors requiring re-registration. Many of these men have left for the mountains with stock and will not return in time. They have no means of knowing of the action of the Board here, and if they do, will not be able to register because of distance. They will be disfranchised, as will be the many others who left the county with stock or for other reasons.

There is another element connected with this matter to which we respectfully call the attention of the taxpayers, and desire that they shall note it as they stand at the railing to be registered. They will observe two extra clerks, paid, we presume, $100 a month each, if not more, and the service they are performing is in the greater part to fill out affidavits containing the very same data that the county paid for two years ago. If the law had been followed, the same ultimate results would have been obtained without expense, for the force in the Clerk's office is amply sufficient to do the work.

There is another matter wherein the Board of Supervisors have erred. It affects, however, only citizens resident in the country. The law provides, and has always been so construed, that deputy assessors should take applications for registration, and should receive for that service fifteen cents per name. The design of that law is obvious. The Assessor is the only officer who has deputies all over the county; and by that system, persons in remote districts would not be subjected to the inconvenience of coming to the city. A resolution has been unwisely passed to attempt to repeal that law. The work of assessment has passed, and it is not likely that deputy assessors will do work without compensation. Again, we understand it to be the rule of the Clerk's office, that no registrations will be made except on personal application at that office. The people of the country have always been emphatic in demanding their just rights. In this matter, it is evident if they desire to vote they will have an opportunity of testing our county roads, and we suggest that they investigate to ascertain who is responsible for this peculiar condition of affairs.

The Assessment Scare.

The publication in the Bee of Thursday concerning alleged manipulations of the county assessment roll, is in keeping with the principle upon which the sensational journal of to-day is conducted. In this matter the Bee succeeded in making itself ridiculous, and permitting itself, as usual, to be made the avenue of dissemination of the personal spite of a man against a public officer. The matter of criticism of the assessment roll, however, is nothing new, for we distinctly recollect, and the file of the Bee will show, that the same alarm, generally speaking, has been sounded by it about every year, and yet strangely the revenues have been collected and the government of Sacramento county still lives. The policy of THEMIS is to act with fairness, and we speak not upon any subject, particularly one that involves the integrity of a man or woman, until after we have made a complete investigation.

In this matter, it appears that Mr. F. A. Shepherd, who acted as Clerk of the County Board of Equalization, and who had been, under the administration of Mr. Griffiths, the principal Deputy Assessor, announced sensationally at the closing hour for certifying the roll, that the Assessor's office had made changes in the roll as it originally stood. Section 3679 of the Political Code, in defining the duties of the County Board of Equalization, provides:

"The Board must use the abstract and all other information it may gain from the records of the County Recorder or elsewhere, in equalizing the assessment of the property of the county, and may require the Assessor to enter upon the assessment book any property which has not been assessed; and any assessment made as prescribed in this section, has the same force and effect as if made by the Assessor before the delivery of the assessment book to the Clerk of the Board."

As we have said, Mr. Shepherd was the Clerk of this Board, and confessedly was aware of the defects in the roll, to which, at the last moment, he excitedly called attention. It would seem he should have called the attention of the Board to them before, and had them rectified under that section. But there is another provision which fully justifies Mr. Frost in this matter. It is Section 3881, and is as follows:

"Omissions, errors, or defects in form in any original or duplicate assessment book, when it can be ascertained therefrom what was intended may, with the written consent of the District Attorney, be supplied or corrected by the Assessor at any time prior to the sale for delinquent taxes, and after the original assessment was made."

The written consent of the District Attorney is attached to the assessment roll. The law evidently contemplates that which would be in the mind of any intelligent man: that it is absolutely impossible to prepare a roll of assessment without errors creeping in, and the experience of any business man is that no set of books can be kept wherein errors will not be discovered. These sections of the law are intended to adjust errors, and the fact has been that no assessment roll has ever been made that was absolutely perfect. We will be curious to see if our sensational contemporary will be just enough to set this matter right. If it does, it will have broken its record.

A Pleasant Gathering.

On Monday evening a party was given by Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Parsons, at their residence, on 17th and G streets. A curtain was suspended to cover the doorway between the front and back parlors. In the front the guests were seated, while the back parlor was used for a miniature stage. L. W. Ripley conducted the entertainment and did so neatly. Whenever the curtain was rung up some novel and interesting feature was presented. There were two charades, in one of which Nanine Wallington, Kate Willis and Clara Parsons participated; and in the other Fannie Wiley, Dora Taylor, Alice Willis and Margaret Parsons. Solos were rendered by Blanche Hand, Dora Taylor and Clara Parsons. At the conclusion of the programme refreshments were served. The party was enjoyable, and appreciated by all who attended. Among those present, besides the host and hostess and their family, were Mesdames Willis, Farley, Beatty Reel, Curtis, Howe, Kinney and Davis; Misses Clara Taylor, Rita Gillis, —Lawson, Annie and Flora Luther, Lizzie Morsehead, Fannie Willis and Ella Howe; Messrs. Wm. Coulter, O. P. Willis, Dr. W. W. Light, Dr. E. L. Curtis, Dr. Southworth Jr., Winfield J. Davis, Dr. Guardey, E. F. Duden, Wm. Coulter, Will Hendricks, Fred and Percy Allen, Luke and Will Howe, L. W. Ripley and J. I. Mandeville.

FLASHES.

The fellow who can keep still when he has nothing to say is a public benefactor.

Our reforms date from the last transgression in which we were caught.

The fellow who prides himself on the assumption that he can drink or let it alone, generally ends up by not letting it alone.

This is a great country to get ahead. We know lots of fellows who get a head by industrious drinking.

Railroad Commissioner.

Wm. Beckman, who has been President of the People's Savings Bank since its organization, is announced as a candidate for the Republican nomination for Railroad Commissioner from this district. Mr. Beckman is well known in the district, and will present strong considerations that will warrant his nomination, being prominent in business circles, of wide acquaintance, and popular. If nominated he will make a successful run.

Register.

Voters should not forget that a new Great Register is being prepared, and every one must re-register or lose his vote. Some labor under the misunderstanding that because their names are on the printed register they are all right. That is, however, not so.

The Ladies' Day.

The Bee's Baseball Ladies' Day edition was finely illustrated, and contained a wealth of words. The illustration, however, of "San Francisco's Efficient Backstop," seems not to be complete. From the attitude of the man it is a question as to from what quarter he expects to receive the ball, and it would seem that he should have an extra mask. A false impression has gone abroad, that the figures the Bee printed are to be cast in bronze, to ornament the grounds of its projected new hotel.

The Weather.

Lightning Bugs as Ornaments.

The other evening I met a person who has made a fortune in the West by importing "lightning bugs." They are worn in the hair or corsage. Speaking of these unique little animals, my informant said:

"I shall soon leave for Cuba and shall return to New York with some 5,000 of these bugs, during the next month. Their color is a jet black, but they can be seen by their bright eyes a square away. These bugs are similar to those that swarm around here in the evenings of April and May, except that they belong to the unabridged variety, measuring from one-half to two inches in length. Their breadth is from one-half to three-fourths of an inch. They have luminous spots on each side of the head, about as large as small peas. These are called eyes, and glow with a constant mellow light. The rear under part of the bug is also luminous, but its full beauty is not seen until it spreads its wings to fly. Then there is a blaze of golden light.

"These little animals are very numerous in the West Indies at this season of the year. They are not hard to capture. All that is necessary is to push a fine hairpin down over the bug's neck, and there it stays. In its efforts to escape the wings are continually lifted, letting out the full glow.

"After the ball is over they are placed under a glass jar, with a bit of sugar cane. Their luminous quality is so great that a half dozen placed in a dark room will enable one to read quite easily. They only appear during the night, and then only in the vicinity of the sugar mills, where they swarm by the million. They live on molasses, crushed cane, or anything sweet."—N. Y. Star.

Early Closing.

The barbers of this city met at Pythian Castle, Thursday night, to consider the advisability of closing at earlier hours. The barbers work perhaps longer hours than any other class. There is no necessity of keeping their places of business open the long hours they now have, and any movement tending toward shortening them is in the line of progress.

Compliment to a Pioneer.

The Pioneers and other friends on Tuesday evening, tendered to Dr. W. W. Light, a surprise birthday party, at his residence. There were also present the survivors of the pioneer ship Humboldt, and the children of the Orphan Asylum. During the evening the doctor was presented with an elegant pioneer badge, and suitable remarks were made.

The Summer Young Man.

The horror of the summer young man is upon us. He is impervious to ridicule or prayer, and he goes on bedecking his meagre form with the toggery of phantasma, as though such things as intelligence and propriety were unknown in this vale of tears. Probably no one will ever be able to explain why a young man who is correctly, properly, decently and conventionally clad during the fall, winter and spring, insists upon dressing like a guy when the hot weather descends upon the town. All up and down Broadway and in some of the uptown resorts are to be found young men wearing blue, green and yellow blazers, huge sashes, fit for little children in the nursery, and silly little caps balanced on the back of their heads. They wear russet leather shoes and roll their trousers up from the bottom, though there has not been any mud in New York for weeks. The manufacturers, to meet an idiotic demand, are turning out silk shirts in which the cardinal colors are shown in vivid and awful contrast. A cigarette-smoking dude with a blue and yellow blazer, a pink shirt shot with green bars and a flaring red necktie, is one of the variations of an unmitigated series of crimes against the visual rights of the citizens of this town. As a rule the young men glory in their flannels. It does not make any difference how cool the weather may be, they cling firmly to their fantastic clothes and flout them in the face of the people. One development of this craze was observed last week when a party of five or six young men came into town every evening in white flannel suits and yachting caps from Larchmont. Of course everybody knew they had nothing to do with yachts, because gentlemen who can support these expensive luxuries do not as a rule stand around barrooms and beer saloons in white flannels. These particular offenders went out every night from business on the 5:30 train, put on their yachting clothes, came back to New York after dinner, showed themselves generally about town and returned to Larchmont at midnight. It must have been a fascinating sort of sport.—N. Y. World.

How Champagne is Made.

Champagne, as everybody knows, was invented—that is the word to use, for the wine certainly was not a discovery—by Dom Perignon, a Benedictine monk, in 1688. Being appointed to the post of cellarman at the Abbey of St. Peter, in the village of Hautvilliers, on the Main, some five miles from Epernay and fifteen from Reims, he conceived the idea of "marrying" various wines. The product of one vineyard was noted for its fragrance, another for its generosity, a third for its color, a fourth for its preservative qualities, and so on. By judicious "blending" Dom Perignon produced a grand wine; a sparkling wine, that burst from the bottle and overflowed the glass. Moreover, it was white, though made from black grapes. It so far excelled all other wines that it quickly won the first place, and took the name of the province—Champagne.

Vast improvements have been made in the manufacture of champagnes since the death of the monk, in 1715, but the principles he introduced have never been abandoned. The newly expressed juice of the grape, after the first fermentation in casks, is conveyed to the cellars, or caves in the chalk rock, and after a brief period it is racked and ready for making the "cuvee," which consists of mixing the wines of various vineyards in such proportions as to produce a perfect wine. In order to insure the greatest uniformity, the mixing is done in gigantic vats, containing from 60,000 to 75,000 bottles. The wine is then returned into casks, and at the proper time, in May or June, bottled, securely corked, and laid away for at least two years and a half in the cellars. Soon after bottling, the second fermentation takes place, which produces the effervescence and forms a sediment. When the wine is ripe for use, it is shaken sharply several times a day for from three to eight weeks by skilled workmen, called "remneurs." Then comes the work of the "degorgeur," who carefully loosens the cork, which flies out, carrying the sediment with it, and a small quantity of the wine.

Discovery in Mexico.

During the recent visit of Jesse R. Grant and Charles J. Whipple, to Sonora, Mex., on business, they were much struck with the sight of a terraced mountain. It is located about fifty miles southwest of Magdalena. The mountain is circular in form, about three-quarters of a mile in diameter at the base, and is terraced from base to peak. The height of the terrace is from ten to twelve feet and in many places is built of solid masonry. At many other places it is cut out of the solid rock. The roadway is from fifteen to twenty feet in width, starting at the base of the mountain and coiling itself spiral-like to the peak of the mountain, which is not less than 1,200 feet higher than the base of the mountain. The cost of the construction and cutting out of the solid rock of this terraced road must have been enormous, and the remarkable feature of this wonder is the state of its preservation. Here and there the masonry has yielded to the crumbling influences of time, but these are exceptions.

At the base of this terraced mountain is a mighty rock, which has the appearance of having been hewn out of a solid rock, and weighs a hundred tons or more. It is placed at the mouth of what appears to be the entrance to this terraced mountain. Here another query is suggested. Does this door to the mountain open the way to mineral treasure or to the shrine of ancient religious devotees? Again, does the terraced road which coils its way to the peak of the mountain lead to the shrine of the ancient vestal virgin who kept eternal watch on the sacred fire which was never suffered to die?

One thing is certain, there is a wide field for those near at home who wander far into Egypt and Persia to study the mysteries of the hidden past.—Tucson Star.

No Burials Alive.

Very comforting news is brought to those who stand in daily dread of being buried alive, in the current number of the Medical and Surgical Reporter, which, in an editorial, says:

"The fear of being buried alive haunts the minds of so many of our fellow men that it may hardly be regarded as strange, in some respects, that it was recently reported that a number of physicians in a city near Philadelphia had banded themselves together to devise means to prevent such a catastrophe in their own case. And, when physicians could take such measures in view of a supposed danger, it is not remarkable that the community should have a special and exaggerated horror of being buried alive. But this horror is as without reason as is the timidity of the physicians referred to. There seems to be no good ground whatever for supposing that it is possible in this enlightened age for any person to be committed to the grave while yet living. Stories reporting such occurrences are by no means rare; but any one who examines them closely will certainly remark that they are wholly lacking in originality, and that there is in fact so strong a resemblance between them as to excite the suspicion that one has been copied from another. Investigation will show, too, that this suspicion is a well founded one; at least such has been the experience of the editor of the Medical and Surgical Reporter, who has for some years followed up every story of burial alive which came to his notice; and always with the result of learning that they were false or of failing to learn anything about their origin.

"The most recent experience of this sort occurred in connection with a story published in the daily papers on June 10, 1890, of a man who was said to have died and to have been buried alive in Chicago. After tracing the story from one point of the newspaper world to another it was found to have originated in a Chicago paper, which said the man had been sent as dead from a hospital in that city on February 23, and that afterward he had been buried, that the buriers had heard sounds like knocking on the coffin lid, but went ahead with the burial, and that after an interval the grave was opened and the coffin lid removed to disclose that the man had turned over, torn his hair out, buried his fingers in his flesh, and so on. At the end of our investigation we received a letter from the hospital stating that it never had a patient of the name given, that no person died in the hospital on the date given, and treating the story as a hoax. The Associated Press agent in Chicago, who started the story round the country, on being asked if he thought there was any truth in it, replied to our representative: 'I am not supposed to believe everything these fellows (meaning the reporters) write.'

"This is the latest story, and it illustrates the unreliability of all that we know anything about, and the utter lack of principle which usually lies at the bottom of them. As physicians, we may by publishing the falseness of such stories, do something to allay the awful fears which they excite in the minds of many of our fellow-beings; and we may hope that those who manage the daily newspapers will some day properly punish reporters who furnish them with such cruel inventions."

"Hurroo for Ould Oireland!" exclaimed Muldoon when he came across the names O'Tempora, O'Mores. "They are cousins of me own, only twice removed," he explained, tossing his head in supreme satisfaction.—Boston Transcript.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento, and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of the guardianship of the estates of Mary F. Hennessy and Walter J. Hennessy, minors.

Elizabeth Hennessy, the guardian of the estates of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said minors, for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estates of said minors appear before the said Superior Court on the 29th day of August, 1890, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Court Room of said Superior Court, in the County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of the said minors as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week, for three successive weeks, in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County.

The people of the State of California,

To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, July 9, 1890.

A COLORADO PHILOSOPHER.

He stood by the fence of a mountain ranch,
A pitiful, sad eyed burro;
There wasn't an edible leaf or branch,
And the alkali ground
For miles around
Had never a sign of furrow.
"Ah, me!" he sighed, "I'm sad it's so.
But life is an endless tussle;
They've let me go in the storm and snow,
For they know I am used to rustle."

"I can go a day on a sardine can
And two on a scrap of leather;
I have lived a week on a Chinese fan,
And it's even plain
That I sometimes gain
On only a change of weather.
The lazy ones feed on hay, indeed!
But I, who have nerve and muscle—
They say: 'He'll do; he will worry through;
He's a wonderful brute to rustle!'"

O! sorrowful burro, thin and sad!
I feel to you like a brother.
With the human race it's just as bad,
For the tramp and shirk
Must escape from work
By the bountiful sweat of another.
There are some that stand with glove in hand
In the infinite toil and bustle;
They sing and play, but they've lots of hay—
They never have learned to rustle!
—Charles P. Allen in Cosmopolitan.

Borrower—You are very kind to lend me these fifty dollars; I feel as if I can never repay you.
Lender—Eh? Why in thitnder didn't you say that at first.—Keystone.

Miss Kitty (disgusted with her country home)—I assure you, my dear, there's not a man in the place.

Caller from town—But you said you played in a whist club; surely there are some gentlemen in that.

Miss Kitty—No, indeed, not one; they are all married men.—Harper's Bazar.

A portly gentleman was seated in one of the East River ferryboats the other day trying to light his pipe, says the New York Times. A street arab of diminutive size sat beside him and behind his elbow, twisting up his lips and gently wafted soft breezes that effectually extinguished the matches, and the portly gentleman continued to light. As match after match went out, the portly gentleman got more exasperated, and the small boy, effectually concealed by the large proportions of his neighbor, got happier. The gentleman looked around at last, and then there was an explosion. But the small boy was a live small boy, and he vanished before any watch could reach him.

A SCARED EDITOR.

A rugged farmer stalked into the sanctum with a big whip under his arm.
"Be you the editor?" "I am," was the half apprehensive reply.

"Here's two dollars—send me your paper, for life," he said.

"You see," he went on, "our daughter was sick and like to die; she drooped and grew weak and pale, had headaches, no appetite, back ached, hands and feet like ice, couldn't sleep, hacked with cough, and we thought she had consumption. No medicine helped her until she tried that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription mentioned in your paper, when she began to mend in no time and is now well and handsome as a rose—put me down as a life subscriber."

Now the editor is looking for another scare. The medicine has cured thousands afflicted as was the farmer's daughter, restoring the female functions to healthy action, and removing the obstructions and suppressions which caused her trouble. It is guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case, or price ($1.00) refunded. It's a legitimate medicine, not a beverage. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to sour or ferment in the stomach and derange digestion.

Can Dogs be Magnetized?

Even Mr. Jingle or Mr. Jesse never thought of applying animal magnetism to sporting dogs. But this is part of "The Scientific Education of Dogs," as taught and practiced by "H. H." whose book is published by Messrs. Sampson & Low. "I have held a lot of dogs by the magnetic power of will from doing wrong, hundreds of yards away from me," says "H. H.," and he adds, that if he unbent his mind by making a remark to a friend, the spell was broken. It cannot be the power of the human eye, he thinks, that acts thus, for how can the eye act at a quarter of a mile's distance? He might shut his eyes, and try if the magnetic power still lasts. "To be a first-rate dog breaker, a man must have lots of animal magnetism," which, according to this philosopher, is developed by force of will. But what is will, or is it a form of "magnetism?"

Even in dog breaking we reach at once the debatable land of metaphysics, and are embarked on Schopenhauer's speculations before we know it. Of animal magnetism exercised by the rider on the horse, little need be said. The man may influence the beast by contact, unconsciously, not by "will force." It is different when "H. H." turns a distant dog from a particular corner of a field by simply "wishing" with all his force. The whip and the will had better be kept separate, as much as may be; and some dogs answer to the will which merely sulk under the whip. The cleverest of "H. H.'s" dogs was a retriever. He was fishing in her company, caught his fly on a stump on the opposite bank, sent the retriever across the water for it, and she brought it safely. When a friend's fly caught in a bough of a willow, some feet above the water, the dog swam across, climbed into the top of the bush, jumped, fastened on the bough as she fell, bit it through and restored the tackle.

This dog was sent for a wounded mallard, which was swimming below the ice. She ran eighty yards down stream, broke a hole in the thin ice and waited like a cat at a mouse-hole. There she caught the mallard as he came up to breathe. If this was not reasoning, what is reason! But some other power must have been exercised in the following case: "H. H." left his dog at the front door of a house, with a friend to watch his proceedings. He himself left the house by aid of a ladder set against a high window in the back and walked away. The dog began to be uneasy as soon as the master had thus escaped, and was with him in five minutes. Can he have been guided by smell or was he attracted by animal magnetism? If the human mind can really influence that of the dog from a distance, the force which we call mind must be common to man and beast, and "in that equal sky" retrievers may keep "H. H.'s" company. The attention of Mr. Romances and of the Psychical Society, as well as the study of sportsmen, should be given to "H. H.'s" book. His anecdote of how the dog insulted the cockney is excellent, but a little in the manner of Dean Swift. We are only beginning to study the psychology of animals, and yet it may be the proper starting-point of those investigations.—London News.

The New York Press has the following communication: "I hear so much about the New York sports winning prizes at eating contests. Now, I am a poor man, but proud, sir, aye, very proud; but I am not too stuck up, sir, to go anybody in this town for $50 that I can down more molasses in five minutes than my challenger can. I come from New Orleans, where the toothsome syrup is frequently on everybody's lips. I offer no objections to spoons in eating; but I warn the person who has nerve enough to bet that he can eat more than I can, that I use a kettle with a spout. Man, money and molasses can be found any day this week at No. 316 West Forty-eighth street. N. O. M."

De Wolf Hopper has warbled "Casey at the Bat" in the hopper of a phonograph for the benefit of future generations. If "Casey at the Bat" is permanently preserved, we needn't care if Lincoln's Gettysburg address does sink into oblivion.—Norristown Herald.

Here is the latest thing in wedding announcements. Smith—Brown.—He is 25 and she is 20. He is 6 feet 1 inch and she is 5 feet 11 inches. He weighs 126 pounds and she weighs 120. He is fond of fat and she is fond of lean. He is a Democrat and she is a Republican. They both belong to the Presbyterian church. They have always been meant for each other.—New York World.

Wife—"What do you suppose baby is thinking about?" The Brute—"I 'spose he's thinking what to cry about to night."

"I whistle and wait for Katie," a companion to "Little Annie Rooney," by the same author, transmitted by cable to a New York paper on Sunday last, has already been issued in sheet form. There will be a general desire to form the acquaintance of Miss Annie's companion.

631 J STREET, Sacramento, Cal.

FROM SIG. MARTINEZ, CONCERT SOLO PIANIST.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style in solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business.

A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

California has been a doubtful State politically since its admission. Conditions have of course changed, since 1849, but the vote she has given is a curiosity. The first State election was held November 13, 1849—hardly a State election—for she was not admitted into the Union until September 9, 1850, yet in November a Governor was chosen. At that election party lines were not drawn. The total vote was 14,213, and Peter H. Burnett was elected Governor, receiving 6,783 votes, the balance being cast for John A. Sutter, W. S. Sherwood, John W. Geary, W. M. Stuart and others. In 1851 John Bigler, the Democratic nominee for Governor received 23,274, to 22,735 for Pierson B. Reading, the Whig candidate. In 1852, Pierce, Democrat, for President, received 40,626 votes, to 35,807 for Winfield Scott, Whig. In 1853, for Governor, Bigler, Democrat, had 38,940 votes, to 37,484 for William Waldo, Whig. There was an effort made to contest that election, and many believed that the Whig candidate had been defrauded of the office. In 1855, J. Neely Johnson, the representative of the American or Know Nothing party, received for Governor 51,157 votes, to 46,220 for Bigler, the Democratic nominee. That was the first break from the adherence of the State to the Democracy, yet it was that very many prominent Democrats gave their adherence to the American party, which in a large measure operated secretly. It was, however, short lived. In 1856, Buchanan, the Democratic nominee for President, received 53,365 votes, to 20,691 for John C. Fremont, Republican, and 36,165 for Millard Fillmore, American. It was quite evident that the State at that time leaned not toward Republicanism. In 1857, for Governor, John B. Weller, Democrat, had 53,122 votes, to 21,040 for Edward Stanly, Republican, and 19,481 for G. W. Bowie, American. In 1859 occurred the first noted split in the Democratic party and one which has never been healed. It was based upon the troubles in Kansas, but subsequently the issue was upon the proposition of loyalty or disloyalty to the Union. In that year Milton S. Latham, an administration Democrat, received 62,255 votes, to 31,298 for John Currey, Anti-Lecompton or Northern Democrat, and 10,110 for Leland Stanford, Republican. In 1860, California first wheeled into line as a Republican State, and gave Lincoln 38,734 votes, to 38,023 for Douglas, 33,975 for Breckenridge, and 9,136 for Bell. In 1861 Leland Stanford was elected the first Republican Governor by a vote of 56,036, to 32,750 for John R. McConnell, Southern Democrat, and 30,944 for John Conness, Northern Democrat. In 1863, Frederick F. Low, Republican, was elected Governor, by a vote of 64,447, to 44,845 for John G. Downey, Democrat. At that time many of the northern or war Democrats had come over to the Republican party, and from that campaign dates the prominent dissensions that followed in that party. We gave the inside history of the campaign of 1863 in a recent number of THEMIS. In 1864, Lincoln for President, received 62,134 votes, to 43,841 for General McClellan, Democrat. In 1867, the Democrats again came into power, and elected Henry H. Haight, Governor, by a vote of 49,905, to 40,359 for George C. Gorham, Republican, and 2,088 for Caleb T. Fay, Independent Republican. In 1868, General Grant, for President, received 54,583 votes, to 54,077 for Horatio Seymour, Democrat—rather a close election under the circumstances. In 1871, Newton Booth, Republican, was elected Governor by a vote of 62,581, to 57,520 for Haight, Democrat. In 1872, General Grant, for President, had 54,020 votes, to 40,718 for Horace Greeley, Liberal and Democrat, and 1,068 for Charles O'Connor, Democrat. In 1875, William Irwin, Democrat, was elected Governor by a vote of 61,509, to 31,322 for Timothy G. Phelps, Republican, and 29,752 for John Bidwell, Independent, or as was then facetiously denominated "Dolly Varden." The Independent movement originated in 1873 and in that year carried the Legislature. It drew heavily from the Republican party, but it will be seen that the combined votes for Phelps and Bidwell left Irwin a plurality of 435. In 1876, Hayes for President, received 79,294 votes, to 76,473 for Samuel J. Tilden, Democrat. In 1879, George C. Perkins, Republican candidate for Governor, received 67,965 votes, to 47,665 for Hugh J. Glenn, Democrat and New Constitution, and 44,482 for William F. White, Workingman. In 1880, for President, Hancock received 80,488 votes to 80,371 for Garfield, and 3,403 for James B. Weaver, Greenback. At that election Edgerton, Republican, beat Terry, Democrat, for elector, and the electoral vote of the State stood: Hancock, 5; Garfield, 1. In 1882, George Stoneman, the Democratic nominee for Governor, received 90,694 votes, to 67,175 for Morris M. Estee, Republican, 5,772 for R. H. McDonald, Prohibition, and 1,020 for T. J. McQuiddy, Greenback. In 1884, James G. Blaine, the Republican nominee for President, received 102,406 votes, to 89,225 for Grover Cleveland, Democrat, and 2,960 for John P. St. John, Prohibition, and 2,010 for B. F. Butler, Greenback. In 1886, for Governor, Washington Bartlett, Democrat, had 84,968 votes, to 84,316 for John F. Swift, Republican, 12,227, for C. C. O'Donnell, Independent, 7,381 for P. D. Wigginton, American, and 6,432 for Joel Russell, Prohibition. It is a matter of curiosity that all of the candidates who ran against Swift, except O'Donnell, are now dead. In that election Waterman, for Lieutenant Governor, had 94,969 votes, to 92,476 for M. F. Tarpey, Democrat. In 1888, for President, Harrison received 124,782 votes, to 117,671 for Cleveland, Democrat, 6,107 for Clinton B. Fisk, Prohibition, and 1,540 for James L. Curtis, American.

We have reviewed generally the elections that have been had in this State since the organization of the government. In the earlier years it could not be expected to be otherwise than Democratic; but it will be seen that since 1860, where there have been Democratic successes the majorities, as a rule, have been small. The Republican State Convention to nominate candidates for Governor and other executive, legislative, and district officers, is about to meet in the State Capitol. It will be the largest political body that has ever assembled in the State. By reason of its size it cannot be controlled by outside influences; and it is safe to predict that its nominees will be acceptable to the people. As we have heretofore remarked, the contest for Governor has about narrowed down to Morrow and Markham, with the chances in favor of the former. Should Mr. Morrow receive the nomination he will prove a strong candidate. He has never yet lost a fight before the people, though he has repeatedly run for Congress in a district concededly Democratic. Col. Markham will go into the convention with a strong support from the southern counties, and not a little from the northern and middle sections. The indecent attacks that have been made upon him by a portion of the press and some politicians, have had the effect to strengthen him; the people realize their injustice. However, the convention should not consider matters of geography in framing the ticket, and the fact that a man lives in a particular county should cut no figure; the man and his fitness should alone be consulted. Experience has demonstrated that when men are elected to State offices, they understand they represent the entire State, and regard one locality as equal to another. We have not taken stock in the worn-out plea, that we must place upon a ticket men of various nationalities to catch particular votes. The American people have risen above that, and it has become offensive to citizens of foreign birth. Nor is there any sense in selecting a man simply because he happens to live at Gougeeye, or Hungry Hollow, when one more available is presented who lives elsewhere. It is a matter of indifference to the people where a man hails from so long as he is qualified. Much has been said concerning Col. Markham; that he favors a division of the State. We do not believe it; and do not believe that, if he should be nominated and elected, the fact that he is a resident of a southern county will weigh a whit with him in his administration. General Chipman we personally know, as also Mr. Shippee. From the present outlook, however, we candidly say, we do not believe they have a chance to secure the nomination. We are, however, not unconscious of the fact that no man can safely predict what will be the determination of a convention of the size this will be. Whatever will be the result, we will be satisfied; and will aid, as best we can, to carry the ticket to success. With the material the convention has to select from, mistakes are impossible; and as we judge the temper of the people, Republican sentiment is predominant.

The prudery of Assistant Attorney-General Tyner in branding Tolstoi's book, "Kreutzer Sonata," unfit for circulation through the United States mails, will only serve as a great advertisement of the book. Thousands who never would have known of its existence, will now lose no time in securing a copy at whatever cost. The exclusion of this work is sheer nonsense. Even if it is as indecent as our government prudes would have us think, they have taken just the course to make it an object of demand. Those who never would have thought of reading "Kreutzer Sonata" in the ordinary course of reading, will be eager to devour its alleged wickedness. As a matter of fact, the work is not indecent. Not more so than hundreds of works of the world's greatest authors. Some plain facts are plainly told, and for this it is forbidden the mails. We assert that the males, and females, too, will have this book, notwithstanding the exclusion ordered by the officials. There is no more certain way to bring a work of this character into note, than to give it the name of indecent. We suspect this is one of the sharp schemes of the publishers to effect large sales; and it is certain this result will follow the condemnation for indecency. No one would ever thought of the "Quick and the Dead," or "Hermia Suydam," except for the dark shading given by criticism for indecency. We would probably have Fielding's, Smollet's, Swift's, Shakespeare's, and Byron's works condemned by the same test applied by the over-nice Assistant Attorney General. Such men never lived in the past, and are certainly not up to progressive ideas of the present.

There is an aristocracy of religion—perhaps that is putting the point too strong, because there is a difference between church and religion—there is an aristocracy of church. True religion is always meek and lowly. In our modern churches, however, religion is only a secondary matter. We need some Bocaccio to tear the mask from the fashionable churches of this date. The church of to-day is devoted only to fashion. The congregation must be fashionable. The edifices must be in fashion. The furniture, carpets, pews, must be of the mold of fashion. Even the minister is required to be of that form and person which women do most admire before he is acceptable to the modern parishioner. Churches are not for the poor in these days. It is a rare thing indeed to hear a good sermon. The preacher—the fashionable one we mean—is usually given to silly sentiment clothed in a very tight garb of meaningless rhetoric, which meets the demands of the women who compose the congregation. Thinking men are not ardent church goers. Most of our fashionable churches are decidedly exclusive. Wealth is the ticket of admission into the select circles. There are few learned men in the pulpit. The twaddle that we see published in the daily journals, which they call Sunday discourses, in a large majority of instances is perfectly sickening to thoughtful men. No broad or comprehensive ideas are found emanating from the fashionable preacher of to-day. His effusions are either pointless, prosy, or else they are mere academic flourishes of words—the latter style seems to be popular with the women who now predominate in church affairs. We have some broad gauge ministers who advance ideas, but they are exceedingly few. Even in these instances they fall victims to calumny, and either have to retire from the pulpit, or by their great power of mind and thought soar above the shafts that are aimed at their honor and sincerity. San Francisco has recently experienced an instance of this nature, where a brilliant man was driven from his charge by vengeful calumny. The church religion of to-day is too much of the refined order—we mean the congregation assumes to itself a refinement which excludes any but the wealthy and fashionable. It is only snobbery after all, and true refinement finds no place in those quarters. The sermons are glittering nothings, said to costly hats and silk and satin gowns resting in velvet covered pews—that is about all. And this is what is called religion.

A PIONEER REMINDER.

Dr. H. W. Nelson, one of the California Pioneers, handed us a few days ago an envelope reminiscent of early days in this State. It is one of a series issued by Putt Stone, an eccentric character, who at that time resided at Greenwood Valley, and who became noted as a song writer. Putt was an original man, and will be remembered by many a pioneer. He committed suicide at Greenwood several years ago. On the face of the envelope we have printed representations of two fully equipped stages; at the top, "Putt's Overland Envelope. This little institution is to be forwarded to its place of destination by Uncle Sam's GREAT MULE RAILROAD, and is expected to arrive inside of schedule time—provided the cars don't get stuck in the mud, nor the locomotive run out of grass!" On the left hand margin are the words "Mules warranted Kind, Poor, Affectionate and devoted to the cause." On the right hand margin "Hurrah for Infernal Improvements! Nothing like it. Go in Sammy!" On the bottom "Overland by Uncle Samuel's Celebrated Mule Railroad Line—established in 1858." On the reverse side is the following, from which it will be inferred that Putt took little stock in Dr. Gwin or the Pacific Railroad enterprise.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

AIR—Villikins and his Dinah.

Say, how would you fancy a trip overland,
By Samuel's Railroad, exceedingly grand;
With mule locomotives for passenger trains,
And kettles for cooking your beans on the plains?

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral &c.

The road o'er the mountains in winter is wet,
And that on the Desert is bilious, "you bet;"
The bottom drops out, and the vehicle in,
So much for the efforts of OLD GRANNY GWIN.

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

When grass won't afford it, they unhitch the team,
And camp by the road to recruit up the steam;

The tar-bucket, silent, would say, could it speak,
"Oh, Railroad Democracy, we've sprung a leak!"

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

To scare off the wolves, when they howl on the track,
The brave engineer hits the leaders a crack;
Tee hungry conductor commences to pray,
When off goes the whip-lash, and — is to pay.

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

They turn out their engines to rest and to feed,
The Injuns then muster and raise a stampede;
And away goes the railroad, no person knows where,
Now that is tremendously grand, I declare.

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

They ferry the rivers wherever they cross,
In case of sea-sickness, knock down a lame hoss;
The mail agent vomits, and off goes his hat,
And with it the mail TUMBLES INTO THE PLATTE.

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

By this institution they'll carry our troops,
And LADIES, providing they go without hoops;
Agree not to meddle with Mormon affairs,
Or advocate Brigham's production of heirs.

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

Oh, Sammy, oh, Sammy, you know you've done wrong,
To build a MULE RAILROAD, so wonderful long;
Your only show now to get pay for your pains,
Is to harness your mules, and drive over the plains.

Chorus—Tu ral lal, lu ral, &c.

A BOY'S WILD CAREER.

Scientific Investigation of a Cable Street Railway that Surprised Everybody.

Little Henry Altenberg who lives with his parents at the corner of West Madison street and Western avenue nearly lost his life to-day as the result of a scientific experiment which he had carried beyond the bounds of personal safety. Since the new street-car cable on Madison street has been running, children have discovered that a strong current of air is continually working down through the slit in the road. Acting on this discovery many of them have amused themselves by tying a piece of paper at one end of a string and an old tomato can or similar article at the other. Laying the piece of paper on the slit they soon had the satisfaction of seeing it disappear under ground, where the string became wound around the cable, and in a moment or two their delight would be intensified by seeing the tomato can go rattling down the street. Little Henry Altenberg, however, is of a reflective turn, and he figured it out that if he tied a rope around his waist he would be able to stop the cable when the slack of the line would be hauled taut, as the lake mariners say. Other boys might fasten cans to the creeping cable, but such divertimento was too tame for him. He lay on the track, peering down the slit, watching the black, shaky object that crawled along below until a great inspiration glowed within him.

Running up to his mother's room, at 803 West Madison street, he quietly and without ostentation took the cord from the family bed. Fastening it about his middle he tied to the other end a piece of paper. Running down the street he dangled the paper into the cable tunnel. His scientific ideas had been well conceived. The currents of air that swished down the dark passage whirled the paper about until the rope wound round and round the cable. Then his wild career began.

Men, women, and children, and the West End gentlemen who wear silk hats and sack coats simultaneously, were soon awe-stricken at the figure the boy was cutting. He pranced down the track like a yearling colt around a bluegrass pasture. His soiled shirt fluttered in the breeze, and his hat blew off. But he did not stop to pick it up; he couldn't. He gripped the rope that so closely identified him with the cable system, and sped on and on. Then he lifted up his voice, swelled his lusty lungs and yelled wildly. People generally shouted "Hey!" at him, and several thoughtful ones asked him if it hurt much; but he only galloped on. He was devoting his whole thought to the scientific investigation he was conducting at such a rapid gait and with such flattering success. He had started up at Leavitt street at 2:10 P. M. At 2:12 he flashed up Hoyne avenue. At 2:13½ he had gathered speed, and was cantering across Seeley avenue. At 2:14 two men, seeing the boy's predicament, rushed out to bear him on his way. One of them tried to jerk the rope away, but could not. Then they began to call for knives. There was a dearth of knives along Madison street just then, and none were forthcoming. More men joined in the exciting chase, but Hennie led them all by several laps. Soon the intense excitement of the situation was beginning to tell on him; when at 2:14½ he made Robey street, and he was panting for breath. Still men shouted and women screamed. The boy joined in and swelled the high refrain. But he could not break away; though reluctantly, he madly sped on.

The end came finally. A. E. Allen, an employe in a paint store, rushed into the street with a huge knife, the only one available along Hennie's entire right-of-way, and trotting along by the boy's side latched the rope in twain. Hennie fell exhausted in his arms, and the thrilling scene was over. Several hundred people stood gaping at the boy who had made such a sensation, and tenderly inquired if he were hurt. But he disdainfully answered, "Naw." Then a big, blue-backed prefect of police placed him under arrest. He was released presently, and silently stole away to his home.

When his mother heard of the wonderful feat he had accomplished, she led him gently away to bed. Throwing the coverlets back over the foot-board, to allow her ample leeway, she raised the bell-cord with which he had made the thrilling trip, and let it fly. For a moment it soured mournfully through the calm atmosphere of the holy Sabbath afternoon. Then no sounds broke the stillness but the sobs of the boy whose inquisitiveness nearly led him to a tragic end. Had he fallen down or overtaken a car he would never have been the recipient of the bitter chastisement that so ignominiously came to mock him in his new-found glory.—St. Louis Republic.

The Old Well-Sweep.

I was driving with a friend, the other day, through a somewhat dreary stretch of country, where there seemed to be very little to attract notice or deserve remark. Still, the old spirit infused by "Eyes and No Eyes" was upon me, and I looked for something to fasten my thought upon, and treat as an artist treats a study for a picture. The first object to which my eyes were drawn was an old-fashioned well-sweep. It did not take much imaginative sensibility to be stirred by the sight of this most useful, most ancient, most picturesque, of domestic conveniences. I know something of the shadoof of Egypt—the same arrangement by which the sacred waters of the Nile have been lifted from the days of the Pharaohs to those of the Khedives. That long forefinger pointing to heaven was a symbol which spoke to the Puritan exile as it spoke of old to the enslaved Israelite. Was there ever any such water as that which we used to draw from the deep, cold well in "the old oaken bucket?" What memories gather about the well in all ages! What love-matches have been made at its margin, from the time of Jacob and Rachel downward! What fairy legends hover over it, what fearful mysteries has it hidden! The beautiful well-sweep! It is too rarely that we see it, and as it dies out and gives place to the odiously convenient pump, with the latest patent on its cast-iron uninterestingness, does it not seem as if the farm-yard aspect had lost half its attraction? So long as the dairy farm exists, doubtless, there must be every facility for getting water in abundance; but the loss of the well-sweep can not be made up to us, even if our milk were diluted to twice its present attenuation.—Dr. Holmes in the Atlantic.

The Bottom of the Sea.

The bottom of the ocean has its hills, valleys and great undulating plains. It has its various soils, of widely different materials. It has its climates also very different in different places, and it has its special races of inhabitants, which depend, like the inhabitants of the rest of the world, upon the conditions of climate and upon the nature of the soil or sea bottom, on which they live. There is a ridge or plain in the Atlantic between this country and Ireland on which the Atlantic cable is laid, and along which Professor Huxley says that, if dry, it would be possible to ride a bicycle, so level is the bottom, while the Challenger found between the Admiralty Islands and Japan that the depth was suddenly more than doubled, increasing all at once from 2,000 fathoms on each side to 4,500 fathoms, indicating the contour of the bottom in that locality as a deep submarine valley, with very steep sides.

Experience.

There is no educator like experience. He is the very best of school teachers, but he has one great discrepancy that interferences with his popularity, and that is the exceedingly high wages he demands.

An unidentified cynic says: "The earlier a man has his eyes opened to the realities of life the sooner he wants to close them." This is no doubt true in some cases, for there are unfortunate beings who are not only compelled to drink the cup of misfortune, but to drain its very dregs.

The lessons of experience are always valuable and firmly fixed in the memory, stamped there by the force of circumstances or printed as with sympathetic ink, by associations that kindle at a word or glance in a vivid glow; as, for instance, when the bunco stealer tries for the second time to rope in a fresh arrival.

Experience is the cream of life, but it often sours with age; for it takes most men forty years to find out that there is not as much amusement in living the other thirty as they anticipated.

At 10 years of age a boy thinks his father knows a great deal; at 15 he knows as much as his father; at 20 he knows twice as much; at 30 he is willing to take his advice; at 40 he begins to think his father knows something after all; at 50 he begins to seek his advice, and at 60—after his father is dead—he thinks he was the smartest man that ever lived.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

She—How I would like to go on the stage and be an actress. I just adore the stage. He—Wouldn't you be satisfied just now with a buss?

Lena DeVine, a young California soprano, who has been absent in Europe for the past four years studying under Lamperti and other teachers.

Clyde Harron is playing such heavy roles as "Stephanie" in Forget-Me-Not, and "Isabel" in East Lynne. Critics say she is remarkably clever in this line. Clyde Harron is the stage name of Lucy O'Brien, a Sacramento girl.

Mrs. Mary E. Bryan, who draws the biggest salary of any woman editor in the United States, has written a comedieta in one act, entitled His Society Play. It is the experience of a New York playwright with the scene in the top story of a lodging house.

Howard P. Taylor has just completed the dramatization of Mark Twain's last work, A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court. It is a spectacular comedy in prologue and five acts, and is said to abound in novel effects and characteristic incidents of middle ages.

Edward E. Kidder, the dramatist, is a busy man. Three new plays of his are to be produced this Fall, viz.: One Error, by Cora Tanner, at the Fifth Avenue Theater; Mischief, by Lotta, at the Park Theater, Boston, and Under a Yoke, in San Francisco. Mr. Kidder is also at work upon a melodrama of New York life, From Dusk to Dawn, and a comedy entitled A Hornet's Nest.

Frederick Warde and Mrs. D. P. Bowers will make their first joint appearance and inaugurate their season in Troy, N. Y., in an elaborate production of Shakespeare's Henry VIII. John H. Young, of the Broadway Theater, has painted the scenery, Hawthorne designed the costumes and David Talbot furnished the properties. A chorus and a chime of bells will contribute to the general effect.

The Dude's March is a new piece of music by Gilmore's band. It must be written in queer time to fit a dude's step and motion. Wherever this has been played, the music has been catchy, and everybody is whistling or humming the tune. If a band of dudes could be brought in line and marched toward the river, without orders to halt or change course, there might be some good accomplished.

Le Reve (The Dream), a ballet in two acts and three scenes, by Messrs. Gastinet and Beau, has been successfully produced at the Grand Opera, Paris. The scene is laid in Tekeno, near Kioto, the ancient capital of Japan, and the plot is taken from a Japanese legend. One sees everywhere idols, chrysanthemums and priests, and Daita, Mlle. Mauri, is admired by all, even the great Matsuri himself. The suitors organize a shooting match, and he who hits the target will marry Daita. A Japanese peasant is the fortunate one, and as he strikes the target, it spreads into an enormous fan that entirely covers the background of the stage. Daita sleeps, and a chrysanthemum bush grows so fast beneath her that she is lifted up forty and fifty feet until she reaches the top of the fan. A little Japanese, looking through an opening in the fan, pulls Daita out of sight. In the scene that follows there is a Japanese heaven with little goddesses floating about. There Daita sees all her lovers, and the peasant is mortally wounded by the prince. This is the dream, of course, and when Daita awakes she descends to earth, marries the peasant and the curtain falls.

Apropos of the marriage of Mary Anderson, the American actress, to Antonio de Navarro, in London, some of the anecdotes that illustrate a few phases of her character are at this moment interesting, writes a Boston Herald correspondent. I am not sure if that one has yet been told that concerns her in the period of her professional career when it was her delight to chew gum, and to stand in the wings of the theater, and do what she could to "break up" the actors who were on the stage. Mary was playing Juliet to the Romeo of a man whom she valued as a friend, but whom she loved to worry. In the last act of the drama, when Juliet is writhing over the body of Romeo, bewailing his death, Mary, on an important first night in a certain city, tickled the Romeo in a way that threatened to galvanize the corpse and ruin the scene. In vain did the actor plead for mercy. He brought every whispered argument to bear upon Juliet to make her desist in her playfulness, assuring her that in another instant he would have to squeal and to bring ridicule upon them both. The actress did not heed the prayers, however, and continued to tickle him as she recited the heartrending lines of the bereaved Juliet. Suddenly the actor changed his tactics, and, under his breath, uttered a string of curses. Juliet stopped short in her lamentations and trembled. Then she went on and Romeo was saved. After the performance it was very difficult for the actor to convince the infuriated queen of tragedy that he was driven to the heroic measure of swearing by her own deviltry. She finally decided that her mischief was more serious than she had fancied, but she declared that the oaths were unnecessarily violent. On another occasion Miss Anderson was living at a private house with some friends in one of the towns where she was playing, and it was her regular custom each morning upon rising to indulge in a pillow fight with the two young ladies of the house. During one of these battles, when the pillows were the thickest, Mary threw her missile at the head of one of the girls, but the latter, being agile, dodged, and it sailed through an open window, lodging among the telegraph wires that ran in front of the house. The passers-by were attracted by the strange sight, and as they glanced they discovered the tousled heads of the three young women peering over the window sill, looking somewhat frightened at the ridiculous work they had accomplished. The prettiest of the heads was that of our own Mary.

Book Chat.

"What hundred books are best, think you?" I said, Addressing one devoted to the pen. He thought a moment, then he raised his head: "I hardly know—I've written only ten."

We believe that journalists generally have far more conscience in dealing with events than they are credited with; but we are afraid that they have also less. This was sometime a paradox, but the situation it suggests would pass with the temptations and privileges hedging in the man who shoots from the dark at a man in the light. There ought not to be any such thing as journalistic authority which can continue in equal force through all the changes of personnel in the journalistic management, and can be handed on from a just and upright man to a mean and cruel and vindictive man, and still carry to the reader the weight of a great journal's name. If every interview were signed, so that the public might understand that it was relying upon the accuracy and honesty of this or that reporter, and not upon the good faith of the journal whose management can have no means of verifying the interview, the interviewer would cease to represent anything but himself, and if he were held directly and personally responsible, it would be much to the health of his own soul, and the advantage of the public. As it is, he is supposed to represent the journal which employs him, and the management is from time to time obliged to endorse him or disclaim him. He is called, in his own language, the Times representative, or the Sun representative, or the World representative; but as a matter of fact he represents nothing but himself. He can represent nothing else; and no writer of leading articles in any journal can represent anything more. Journalistic entity is a baleful fiction, a mask which ought to be torn from the features of the Browns, Joneses and Robinsons who usually wear it.—W. D. Howells.

In one of the cleverest of modern French political burlesques the author describes a battle-field on which a young soldier is mourning over the corpse of his comrade, when a grim old sergeant says, sternly: "Leave off blubbing, you fool. What are making all this noise about?" "Poor Pierre Laffeur is dead, sergeant." "Dead, do you say? Young man, remember for the future that no soldier is to be considered dead until he has been entered as such upon the official list of killed and wounded." A gentleman of such rigid accuracy might have claimed kindred with the scrupulous Quaker who always spoke of a yew-tree as a thou-tree; but even this exactness has been rivaled elsewhere, as may be seen by the following story, which, if not literally true, certainly deserves to be so. Shortly after the publication of Tennyson's famous poem, "A Vision of Sin," the Laureate was somewhat startled to receive from Mr. Babbage, the renowned arithmetician, a letter which ran as follows: "Dear Sir: I find in a recently published poem from your pen, entitled 'A Vision of Sin,' the following unwarranted statement:

"Every moment dies a man,
Every moment one is born."

I need hardly point out to you that this calculation, if correct, would tend to keep the sum total of the world's population in a state of perpetual equipoise, whereas it is a well known fact that the said sum total is constantly on the increase. I would therefore take the liberty of suggesting that in the next edition of your excellent poem the erroneous calculation to which I refer should be corrected as follows:

"Every moment dies a man,
And one and a sixteenth is born."

I may add that the exact figures are 1.167, but something must of course be conceded to the laws of metre. I have the honor to be, sir, yours sincerely, C. BAB-BAGE."—Harper's Magazine.

Mrs. Lyman Abbott, wife of the successor to Henry Ward Beecher, as pastor of Plymouth Church, is to become one of the editors of the Ladies Home Journal.

Professional Chat.

Young Physician—There are nine doctors in town. I'm going to leave. Townsman—Not discouraged, doctor? Young Physician—No; only out of patience.

"Shakespeare comes pat in judicial decisions frequently," says the Albany Law Journal. "In a recent case for slander in California, McFarland, J., remarked: 'Of this language the ordinary man would say, with the hostess in Henry IV: 'These are very bitter words.'"

"Yes," said an Oklahoma divine, "unless he can bend somewhat to the pressure of circumstances, the path of a minister of the Gospel in the Territory will not be wholly a rose-strewn way. You see, at Boomopolis the race track is three miles from the settlement; and, as my voice was never stentorian, you can realize the difficulty I experienced Sundays in reaching my congregation. But where there's a will there's a way, and now I occupy a place on the judges' stand and preach between the heats."

One cold night John C. Spink, Judge Way, the late Chief Justice Waite, and a number of other lawyers of that day, who were attending court at Maumee, were at the hotel kept by Mr. Kingsbury, an uncle of Col. Henry D. Kingsbury, bailiff for the circuit court. They were sitting in a circle about a large fireplace, telling yarns and enjoying themselves hugely. A man rode up to the hotel on horseback, dismounted, stripped off his overcoat, leggings, leather overshoes, and was escorted, before fairly warm, into the dining room for supper. After eating his supper, the stranger, who had the appearance of being a well-to-do farmer, was invited into the sitting-room, adjoining the bar-room, where the lawyers were seated about the fire. The man was cold, fairly chilled through from riding, but there was no move on the part of the lawyers to make room for him near the glowing logs in the fireplace, but they were otherwise quite cordial in their greeting, and evidently thought to have a little sport at the expense of the stranger. One asked the man where he hailed from. "Chicago," was his reply. Then another inquired as to the condition of the roads there. "They are horrible," he said; and continuing, remarked that "the roads through the swamps between here and Chicago are the worst I ever saw—worse than h—ll." This last remark struck Judge Way as an opening for the fun to begin, so he turned toward the stranger and said: "My dear sir, you speak like one familiar with h—ll. How are things down there?" To this the stranger replied: "O, it is there just as it is everywhere else, the lawyers are always nearest the fire." That circle opened at once and made room for the shivering stranger.

The late Judge Robert C. Clark had a strong appreciation of humor, and rarely forgot to turn tables to his advantage, in a quiet but very effective way. Early in the seventies there was held at the high school, then located at Seventh and G streets, a "public," and the Judge was among the invited guests. He left his silk hat and cloak in a chair in the ante-room at the head of the stairs; and some of the boys concluded it would be a good joke to engage in a scuffle, that one would sit on the cloak and mash the hat. It was done, and at the termination of the exercises the Judge picked up his cloak, and found under it his silk hat mashed flat. He ran his fist into it to bring it into something like shape, and remarked: "I will bet some of these confounded boys did that purposely." Some years passed on, and in Judge Denson's office one day, when he and Judge Clark were Superior Judges, the Reporter of the courts recalled the incident, and asked the Judge if he recollected it. "I do," said the Judge; "it was a good joke." "Well," said the Reporter, "the statute of limitation has run; I was the fellow that sat on that hat, and Phil. Platt and Harry Snow were in the plot." The Judge laughed heartily, and nothing more was expected to come of it. Some months afterward, however, the Reporter presented to the Judge several orders for the allowance of his fees in criminal cases. The Judge's signature was, of course, necessary to get the money. The Judge examined them with attention, and looking over his spectacles, remarked: "By the way, Winfield, I have a little paper I wish you would sign." "Certainly, Judge, I will do anything to accommodate you"—supposing it was a petition. It turned out, however, to be an order for a ten-dollar hat. It was signed, and the old judge quietly remarked: "This court does not respect the statute of limitations."

Josh Billings' Philosophy.

The desire to get even is the first acknowledgment of failure.

When I hear a man bragging on his ancestors I won't envy him, but I will pity the ancestors.

It iz just az natural tew be born ritch as poor, but iz seldom so convenient.

I won't hanker for happiness, but if I see enny that I think iz a bargain, I will shut up one eye and go for it.

I won't advise ennybody until I know the kind of advice they are ankshus tew follow.

NOTES.

The statement is made in financial journals that there is not money enough in existence to pay the debts of the nations of the world. If that be true what is the use for a plain ordinary citizen to pay his debts? Give the nations the first chance.

A. G. Bierce, by some caustic references to Oakland girls, has brought down the wrath of the girls of the modern Athens upon his devoted head. If Bierce had only been an Oakland census taker, what a glorious opportunity there would have been for the joint action of the girls and the disappointed population cranks.

The squabble among political wire workers and architects in this city over the selection of a Superintendent for the construction of the new Federal building, has resulted apparently in the selection of an Eastern man for the position, to the exclusion of home talent. When we get to fighting among ourselves this is the usual result—all get left.

Hon. Chas. H. Garoutte, of Yolo, is a candidate for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. Judge Garoutte is a young man, but has the benefit of six years experience on the nisi prius bench, as Superior Judge of Yolo county. He is popular, and the prospects are very favorable towards his promotion. Judge Garoutte will make an able and industrious member of the Supreme Court.

Judge W. H. Beatty, for Chief Justice, should have no opposition for nomination. He is an able lawyer and experienced judge. His term of two years has better fitted him for the position. There is some opposition in San Francisco on behalf of Ralph Harrison, who is an able lawyer, but it is not at all probable that it will be formidable. Judge Beatty will be, and should be, retained as the Chief Justice.

The Supreme Court has decided that a municipality has power to put any conditions it pleases, in ordinances concerning the regulation and sale of intoxicating liquors. A city has authority to prohibit the sale of liquors, therefore can put any restrictions or conditions it may elect. Thus when the consent of residents of any locality is required as a condition precedent, it must be obtained, else there can be no saloon.

The roll calls for the Republican State Convention are being printed by A. J. Johnston & Co. When we consider that this roll will have six hundred and seventy-seven names, it suggests the idea that it will take a great amount of time to call the roll on the vote for the several officers. Great care is taken in printing these rolls, so that tallies can be kept showing how each delegate voted. It is the most complete work of the kind ever done in this State.

The moulders strike at San Francisco has been productive of no good and very much harm. Two or three men have been killed. The families of the victims as well as of the slayers are wrecks. The parties who did the killing cannot be blamed, as in each instance they were acting in the defensive. The situation is unfortunate. While the workers have cause for complaint, there is nothing to justify the lawless acts that have attended this strike. We trust that better counsel will hereafter prevail, and these curses of blood averted.

There is nothing so depressing on man as the lack of money. A fellow in straightened circumstances is not free or cheerful. He always feels as though there is a heavy weight upon his mind which prevents him from thinking of anything but his deplorable state. Now just put fifty dollars in his pocket and see him brighten up and step off with an independent and self-satisfied air. It makes all the difference in the world whether a fellow has money in his pocket or not. If he has, he is free in mind and thought, if not, the reverse is the situation. There can be nothing cheerful in poverty. Just a little wealth often makes us happy at least for a time.

We often indulge in the sentiment that the women who can cook are life's greatest blessings. The time is not far distant when women will do no cooking, or any other housework. She is destined to be the real, genuine companion of man, without doing the household drudgery; when she can devote her time to her children, without slaving in the kitchen or over the washtub. There is approaching a kind of Utopian period for women. Man's inventive genius is fast perfecting machinery to do all work, even that of the household, now woman's realm. No more standing over hot fires preserving fruits, etc., baking bread, pies, and cakes, or the part of women. Men and machinery will do the work. "Touch the button," will be the order, and breakfast dinner, and all other service will be done. We shall live to see this state of affairs.

We have observed that Alex. Montgomery, of the Yreka Union, jumps THEMIS that it is a Republican journal. We admit we have made a mistake. During the war Zack. Montgomery, Beriah Brown, Long Primer Hall, Alex. Montgomery, and a few others ran Copperhead journals in this State. We knew Zack. was in Washington; that Brown and Hall had left California, and in truth, presumed that Alex. was dead. Had we known that he yet survived, we certainly would not have attempted to advocate Republican principles.

When our new street railway service was introduced, we expected that there would be some system in the management. But the Central Street Railway Company seems to have an idea that the public have no rights it is bound to respect. The cars are run irregularly. People who expected the company would keep its promises, are doomed to disappointment. Last Sunday, for example, many who had started to go out to Oak Park only reached Twenty-eighth street. Others were over two hours in making the trip. There was no system whatever in making connections. The drivers were left in charge of the cars without conductors. In fact, there is an apparent disregard of the comfort or convenience of passengers. There is blundering somewhere in the management which must be remedied, else patronage will be withdrawn.

The Kemmler Execution.

Kemmler, who brutally murdered his mistress at Buffalo, New York, was the pioneer to suffer the infliction of the death penalty by an electric shock. From the accounts that have been published it would seem the matter was badly botched; yet we doubt not the law of New York, providing for the execution of sentences of death by this scientific mode, will, in the end, bring about a more genteel and humane mode of death dealing than the prevailing custom of hanging. We are aware that a considerable prejudice exists against the infliction of the death penalty in any case; yet experience has demonstrated that it is at times necessary. Laws have been passed to abrogate it, but they have mostly been repealed. The people have discovered the wisdom of the great code—the foundation of all our laws—that came to us from the Master, through Moses: "And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death. * * * Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again. And he that killeth a beast, he shall restore it: and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death. Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger as for one of your own country: for I am the LORD your God."

Throughout all the ages that have passed the rule of the great law-giver has been respected by all nations; and the sections we read in the law books to-day are but an enunciation in detail of the principles he so tersely expressed. The question, however, has not been so much that of the justice of visiting death upon murderers as the manner of its infliction; and in former ages, particularly for political infractions, the more cruel methods were adopted. Perhaps stoning or beating was first resorted to, when it was deemed necessary to end the life of an offender. The horrible crucifixion followed. Later on, beheading became fashionable; first by the sword, or headsman's axe, when, finally, Dr. Guillotin, in 1789, invented the decapitation machine that bore his name. As a matter of fact, similar contrivances had been in use in Europe two centuries before the invention of the doctor; but he made a profitable strike, for his first order from the government covered eighty-three machines. The instrument was first tried April 18, 1792, upon three hospital corpses, and worked so satisfactorily that seven days later it was publicly used in the decapitation of a highwayman. Later on, execution by hanging or shooting became popular. The tendency of this century has been to inflict punishment in the most humane manner, and in most of our States civil law directs extreme punishment by hanging; with the military, the victim is generally seated blindfolded on his coffin and shot by a squad. Really, that is the more humane method, when considered apart from the mutilation of the body. Yet shooting, even from many rifles, does not always result in instant death; for in the case of the unfortunate Emperor Maximilian, who met death by shooting in Mexico, on June 19, 1867, after the volley had been fired he fell badly wounded, and was dispatched by an additional shot at short range.

No man wants to die, and few have been permitted to choose the manner of death. We are not aware of but one place where choice is left to one condemned, and that is in Utah. As we understand, the laws of that Territory give the option to the condemned to meet his fate either by hanging, beheading or shooting. John D. Lee, a prominent member of the Mormon church, on September 16, 1857, acting under orders from the leaders of the organization, headed a company that cruelly massacred, at Mountain Meadows, a party en route from Arkansas to California. It was not till 1877 that Lee was brought to justice. He was convicted, sentenced to death, and given the choice of the manner of its infliction. He chose shooting, and on the morning of March 23d of that year, was taken to Mountain Meadows, near the monument that had been erected to the memory of the murdered emigrants, and shot to death by a squad of six United States soldiers. He requested that he should be shot at short range and that the aim should be taken at his heart. Three bullets passed through his heart and he fell back upon his coffin and died without a struggle. While we believe most men would have chosen as did Lee, yet there is little difference between hanging and accurate shooting, so far as suffering is concerned, but a bullet may fail to reach a vital part and the condemned may suffer. With hanging, however, life is practically extinct the instant the end of the rope is reached, and the struggles that follow are but muscular. The shock of the fall must of necessity produce unconsciousness and it is not recovered. The only difficulty about hanging is the repulsion that has grown up against it, and we appreciate the advance New York has made in supplanting it with a more respectable method of dealing death judicially. In the case of Kemmler it was experimental, and from the accounts, he took a commendable interest in it. There is, however, no doubt death can be caused instantaneously by an artificial electric shock, and in the cases of accidental deaths that have resulted from that cause, there has apparently been no pain.

An Electrical Carriage.

C. A. Fisk, of this city, has been engaged for a long time past in the construction of an electrical carriage, by means of which a cheap, reliable, and rapid mode of conveyance will be at the disposal of every one, and he thinks the day is not far distant when the trip from Sacramento to New York city can be made in one of these carriages in 24 hours. Should the public experiments he intends shortly to make prove successful, he intends having the principles governing the propelling power of the carriages applied to large passenger coaches, so that the traveling public will be enabled to make the journey from San Francisco to Chicago and back the same day.

Ladies' Day.

Ladies and their escorts are invited to inspect Sacramento's grand Café Royal this afternoon, between one and three o'clock. No gentleman admitted unless accompanied by a lady. Nothing will be sold during those hours. The doors will be thrown open to the public in the evening at 7 o'clock. Very respectfully, H. D. GAMBLE, Sole Proprietor.

We Cannot Understand Him.

We have a friend of the name of John Gruhler, who has a penchant for secret societies, but he, to our mind, is inconsistent. At one time he shows up as a member of the German Red Men, an organization that is supposed to represent an improvement on the aborigine. The other day he was riding through the streets wearing a red nightcap, and palming himself off in a community where his nationality is known, as an Arab from the great Sahara desert. If the weather was not so dreadfully warm, it would not surprise us if he appeared on J street clad in a suit of walrus fur, claiming to be a refined Esquimaux. This thing should meet an ending. We are at peace with the Indians and the Arabs; they treat us with due respect. Suppose Mr. Gruhler in a travel in the wild West should encounter a party of Indian braves, who would open their meeting by singing "Die Wacht am Rhine," address their presiding officer reverentially as Kaiser, put in their time of meeting in drinking Buffalo beer and smoking long pipes, and denominate themselves as the better order of Germans. Then, again, suppose our friend were in Arabia, and would meet a party of that country attired in their native costumes, except that they wore plug hats and smoked five-cent cigars, and would declare they were improvements on the great American sovereigns. In this Arabian matter, it appears there is an imitation of the pilgrimage to Mecca; but it must be recollected that the Arabs perform the journey on foot, while the American imitation Arabs use San Francisco as a symbol of Mecca, and travel there in palace cars.

Sketches of the Men Who Will Appear Before the Republican State Convention.

The near approach of the meeting of the Republican State Convention gives interest to the life careers of the gentlemen who are likely to come before it as candidates for the office of Governor. We sketch them briefly:

Hon. William W. Morrow, of San Francisco, was born near Milton, Wayne county, Indiana, July 15, 1843; removed with his parents to Illinois in 1845, and settled in Adams county; received a common school education, supplemented by private tuition in special branches; came to California in 1859; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1869; was Assistant United States District Attorney for California from 1870 to 1874; Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee from 1879 to 1882; attorney for the State Board of Harbor Commissioners from 1880 to 1883; chairman of the California delegation to the National Republican Convention at Chicago, in 1884; elected to Congress November 4, 1884; reelected November 2, 1886, and November 6, 1888. In 1882 he ran with the late Henry Edgerton for Congressman-at-large, and received 73,747 votes, but both were defeated. The Fourth Congressional District, which he has represented three times, is Democratic, but at each election he has received handsome majorities.

Colouel Henry Harrison Markham was born in Wilmington, Essex county, New York, November 16, 1840. On his father's side his ancestors were English, and the Markhams of this country trace their origin back to Sir William Markham, who was Deputy Governor under William Penn. On his mother's side, Mr. Markham's ancestry is Scotch. He received an academic education, and soon after reaching his majority entered the army as a private in the 32d Wisconsin Infantry. He was in many battles in the West, and was with Sherman in the famous march to the sea. He was commissioned Colonel, was wounded, and in June, 1865, honorably discharged. On his recovery he practiced law in Milwaukee, until 1879, when he removed to Pasadena, Los Angeles county. On November 4, 1884, he was elected to Congress from a district comprising fourteen of the southern counties, and received 17,397 votes, to 16,990 for R. F. Del Valle, Democrat; 821 for Gould, Prohibition; and 236 for Kinley, Greenback.

General Norton P. Chipman was born in Milford Center, Union county, Ohio, and is 54 years of age. His parents were natives of Vermont, and from his father's side came from a family who were conspicuous as lawyers and statesmen in the early history of the country. General Chipman's father removed to Iowa in 1840, and his son received his education at Washington College, Iowa, and afterward entered the law school at Cincinnati, from which he graduated in 1857, and commenced law practice at Washington, Iowa. At the call for troops in 1861 Mr. Chipman promptly responded, and was made Lieutenant of Co. H, Second Iowa Infantry, the first three-year regiment from that State. Mr. Chipman was appointed Adjutant of the regiment, then elected Major. He was severely wounded at the battle of Fort Donelson, while the regiment was charging the rebel entrenchments. After the battle of Shiloh he was promoted to be Colonel and Aid-de-camp on the staff of General Halleck, on April 17, 1862. In the winter of 1863-4 he was transferred to the War Department for duty in Secretary Stanton's office, and there remained until the close of the war. On March 13, 1865, he was commissioned Brigadier General and mustered out on November 30th of that year. He was Judge Advocate of the military commission that tried and convicted Henry Wirtz, the Andersonville Prison Jailer. In 1870 he was appointed Secretary of the District of Columbia, and was soon afterward elected a delegate to Congress and served two terms. In 1875 he removed to California, and has since been in the law practice at Red Bluff. He was one of the founders of the Grand Army of the Republic, and has filled prominent positions in that organization.

L. U. Shippee, of Stockton, was born in East Greenwich, Rhode Island, in 1824; learned the machinist's trade, and followed it at that place and in Connecticut for a time; then managed the home farm for two years; arrived in California in 1856, and settled at Stockton; first started an ice cream and confectionery establishment; in September, 1856, engaged in the grocery business; in April, 1857, started to work in a dry goods store and remained in that position until 1865, under several firms who succeeded in the business. In 1865 he embarked in the grocery business as a partner, and in 1868 purchased land and engaged in the business of raising fine stock. That occupation he has since followed. He was one of the originators of the Stockton Savings and Loan Association in 1864, and in 1872 took hold of the San Joaquin Agricultural Society when it was heavily in debt, placed it upon its feet and has since been its President. For a number of years he has been a Director of the State Agricultural Society, and filled the office of Mayor of Stockton.

J. B. Patterson, of Placer, is a native of Pennsylvania, and has been prominently identified with politics and business for many years. In 1881 he was elected to the State Assembly from Nevada county.

John Bidwell.

General John Bidwell, who has received the Prohibition and American nominations for Governor, was born in Chautauqua county, N. Y., August 5, 1819; both of his grandfathers fought in the Revolution. In 1829 he removed to Erie, Pa., and in 1831 to Ashtabula county, Ohio; was educated at Kingsville Academy; taught school in Darke county in the winters of 1838-9, and also for two years in Missouri. In 1841 he emigrated to California, being one of the first to cross the overland route, a journey occupying six months; had charge of Bodega and Fort Ross, and also of Sutter's Feather river possessions; served in the Mexican war, rising from Second Lieutenant to Major; was the first man to find gold on Feather river, in 1848; was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1849, but did not serve; represented Sacramento District in the first session of Legislature as a Senator; was a delegate to the Charlestown Presidential Convention in 1860; served as a Brigadier General of the State militia; was elected Representative in Congress November 8, 1864; selected as a delegate to the Philadelphia "Loyalist" Convention of 1866; was tendered the Independent nomination for Governor in 1867, but declined; ran unsuccessfully on the Independent ticket for Governor in 1875.

The Matter of Registration.

We have heretofore made reference to the matter of re-registration of the voters of this county, and as the work progressed the difficulties we at the outset pointed out became more apparent. Two years ago the county authorities compiled a register that so completely identified voters, that in the city the particular numbers of their residences were given, and in the country the particular precinct. The work cost considerable money, but it was so perfect that by the application of the law governing cancellations, it could have been utilized for years. The Supervisors, however, a majority of whom are Democrats, determined recently to order a re-registration, and the work is now being done, and the expense will be very considerable. We have never favored parsimony in the administration of government, but have opposed expenditures that are, as in this instance, worse than useless. The fact will be conceded, that with all the precautions that may be taken, a large number of good citizens will be deprived of their votes, through misapprehension or absence from the county, and that everyone who has a financial interest in elections will register. The argument has been made that had the old register been permitted to stand, a large number of "hobos" would vote. It must, however, be recollected that in the main the objectionable characters were registered from places they have not since occupied, and it is not at all likely they would successfully run the gauntlet in November.

The matter of the manner in which the re-registration is being conducted has been under consideration by the Republican County Central Committee, of which body the writer is Chairman, and we will say with candor the situation was regarded as ominous. The history of the matter is this: The Board of Supervisors passed an order for re-registration. Heretofore applications for registration were taken in part by Deputy Assessors for popular accommodation, particularly in remote sections in the country—to accommodate those who would be inconvenienced by coming into the city. For that service the Assessor's office has been allowed 15 cents a name. Following the order for re-registration the Supervisors passed, on June 16th, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this Board, the County Assessor is not entitled to receive any fees or compensation for registering the names of voters, and this Board will not allow any claims for such registration if presented."

Yesterday the matter was again considered by the Board and the resolution was rescinded, and now it will be that the Clerk and Assessor will receive applications for registration, and appropriate compensation will be made. In this later action the Board acted wisely, for it will enable voters in the country to be registered without having to come to the city, and those in the city who neglect or misapprehend, will be sought out and enrolled.

Gin Punch and Literature.

From the New York Star we copy the following: It has been said by a leading critic that an aroma of gin punch pervades all of Dickens' novels. There was, by recent accounts, a reason for this. According to Mr. John Hollingshead, Dickens had a personal weakness for this concoction, and was an expert at compounding it, which process Mr. Hollingshead thus describes: "First of all the jug was produced—the vat or the receptacle of the brew. Then came a plate and knives, then the lemons, the sugar basin, and then finally a large table napkin. In the meantime, the kettle on the hob had prepared the boiling water, and the bottle of distilled liquor—an important factor, as the phrase goes—was placed in the hands of the master. I shall be guilty of no irreverence if I say at this point his eyes twinkled and generally winked. The process of blending was like a conjuring trick performed by an accomplished professor. The mixture being made with care and delicacy and a certain amount of demonstrative pride, the jug was placed upon the table and a napkin thrust into its mouth. The brew, timed by the master's watch, had begun, and in a few minutes the napkin was withdrawn, and 'five shillings and costs' was ready for convivial distribution." The nickname "five shillings and costs," it may be added, was given to the punch by Mr. Hollingshead on account of its potency and the likelihood that those who partook of it would have to pay that amount of fine to a police magistrate in the morning.

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street.

Did You Ever?

Did you ever meet a man that didn't want to talk about himself just when you wanted to talk about yourself?

Did you ever want to borrow money when everybody else didn't seem to be just as bad off as you were?

Did you ever know a woman who thought her husband was the smartest man on earth who wasn't a happy woman?

Did you ever know a man who was afraid to do his duty whom anybody had any respect for?

Did you ever perform a kind action in your life without feeling better for it?

Did you ever do anything mean without feeling that you had killed something good in your soul by doing it?

Did you ever have anybody tell you an unwelcome truth about yourself without hating them for it?

Did you ever make a dollar in the devil's way without having to pay a dear price for it?

One dollar will buy more at S. A. Dorrance's New Cash Grocery, than at any other store in the city. 817 J Street Sacramento.

Pawnbrokers and Seashore.

"This is one of the busiest seasons for me," said a pawnbroker yesterday. "You see, the impecunious young men are now about to go to the seashore, and they leave with us all they can dispense with in order to help defray their expenses while masquerading down there as wealthy young men and angling for young women with good bank accounts. Just now we have on hand a very large stock of overcoats, ulsters and watches, the advances on which will find their way in short order to the tills of the seashore hotel-keepers. Some of these men have been customers of mine for years, and when I see them come in with their bundles I know that the season at the seashore has opened. When the weather cools up in the fall they will raise the money in some manner and then come in and redeem their pledges.—Exchange."

Does Dressmaking Pay?

The possibilities for making money at dressmaking are not appreciated by the unskillful. Many women have retired from business comparatively wealthy, and live in much comfort if not luxury on the income derived from dressmaking. The salaries earned by girls working in shops and large dressmaking establishments compare favorably with the wages earned in other departments open to women. Sleeve-makers earn from $5 to $10 a week—as much and more than many down-town typewriters receive; waist trimmers get from $10 to $12 a week; fitters vary from $12 to $20, and drapers earn from $18 to $20 a week—sums equal to those earned by many teachers in aristocratic schools. The forewomen who do skirt-cutting and attend to the work-room earn $25 a week, and the forewomen who superintend the trimming of waists and special orders get from $20 to $30 a week.—N. Y. Times.

An old bachelor says that giving the ballot to women would not amount to anything practically, because they would keep denying they were old enough to vote until they got to be too old to take any interest in politics.

What the "Brank" Was.

In the "Historical Description of the Tower of London, 1774," is the following:

"Among the curiosities of the tower is a collar of torment, which, say your conductors, used formerly to be put about the women's necks that scolded their husbands when they came home late. But that custom is left off now-a-days to prevent quarreling for collars; there not being smiths enough to make them, as most married men are sure to want them at one time or another."

But our ancestors were beginning to find out that

A smoky house and a scolding wife
Are two of the greatest plagues in life.
The first may be cured; 't'other ne'er can,
For 'tis past the power of mortal man.

And yet, they did not despair. Men's wits were set to work, and a triumph of ingenuity was produced—the brank, the scold's or gossip's bridle; which had the immense advantage over the ducking stools of compelling the victim to be silent, a punishment almost fiendish in its conception. Its inventor is unknown, but he probably hailed from the "North Countree," as "branks" is a northern name for a kind of bridle. It never seems to have been a legal punishment, as the ducking-stool was; but, nevertheless, it obtained, and there are many examples in existence.

It was, in the simplest form, described by Waldron, in his "Description of the Isle of Man." "I know nothing in the many statutes or punishments in particular but this, which is, that if any person be convicted of uttering a scandalous report, and cannot make good the assertion, instead of being fined or imprisoned, they are sentenced to stand in the market place, on a sort of scaffold erected for that purpose, with their tongues in a noose of leather; and having been exposed to the view of the people for some time, on the taking off of this machine they are obliged to say three times: 'Tongue, thou has lied.'" It was commonly made as a sort of cage of hoop iron, going over and fitting fairly to the head, with a flat piece projecting inward, which was put in the mouth, thus preventing the tongue from moving. It was then padlocked, and the scold was either chained up or led through the town.

The earliest dated brank is preserved at Walton-on-Thames, and bears the date 1633, with the inscription:

Chester presents Walton with a bridle
To curb women's tongues that talk too idle.

There is a very grotesque one at Dodding-ton Park, in Lincolnshire, which is a mask having eye-holes, and a long funnel-shaped peak projecting from the mouth. And there were some terribly cruel ones, with fearful gags; but these can scarcely come under scolds' or gossip's bridles. There was one at Fortar with a spiked gag which pierced the tongue, and an even more severe one is at Stockport; while those at Ludlow and Worcester are also instruments of torture.

We have seen men strive and fail to cure scolds, and we know the race is not extinct. Might not the old style of punishment be revived with a beneficial effect? No one can tell the amount of domestic unhappiness that might be avoided by a gentle pointing to the brank, kept hanging in a convenient place; or, if the ducking stool were again introduced, by a quiet remark as to the probable temperature of the water and the inconvenience of getting wet.—English Magazine.

Cooks in Demand.

There was a lively and amusing scene, relates the New York Tribune, at the close of a lecture on "Dietetics" by Mrs. Emma P. Ewing, at Chautauqua, on Tuesday last. The lecturer was subjected to a powerful "quiz" by her audience, and delivered off-hand some original expert opinions on household economy. Among other things the lecturer said: "A family of eight persons, in most parts of the country, can have excellent meals cooked and served for $1.75 each a week. The average housekeeper is a wretched caterer and cook, and the average matron or steward is generally worse. Domestic economy should be made a branch of study in our schools. We have at least 8,000,000 kitchens to prepare the food for 60,000,000 people; but of the 600,000 barrels of flour that are daily manufactured into bread and pastry, how much is fit for food?"

"It seems an easy matter to cook potatoes; but how many are cooked as they should be? Lord Bacon's field was right when he said that a cup of coffee was the most delicious but the rarest beverage in the world, and I really believe that not one person in 10,000 can make toast properly. Cooks, as a rule, don't know what food to select or how to handle it, and until they learn the effect of hot and cold water in making coffee, the regulation of temperature, the making of dough, and so on, dyspepsia will continue a fashionable disease, and the kitchen will make invalids instead of healthy persons."

A woman died under very suspicious circumstances in a small house near Marshall, Ills., last November. Since then, it is said that a form in white has been seen to pass in and out of the house at the same hour each night.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of the guardianship of the estates of Mary F. Hennessy and Walter J. Hennessy, minors.

Elizabeth Hennessy, the guardian of the estates of Mary F. and Walter J. Hennessy, minors, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of the real estate of said minors, for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estates of said minors appear before the said Superior Court on the 29th day of August, 1890, at 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, at the Court Room of said Superior Court, in the County of Sacramento, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said guardian to sell so much of the real estate of the said minors as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week, for three successive weeks, in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Dated July 24, 1890.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said County.

The people of the State of California,

To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

By W. W. RHODES, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, July 9, 1890

Too Many Doctors.

We have a ridiculous surplus of doctors in the United States. The medical schools on turning out physicians by the thousand every year. The ratio of doctors increases faster than the population. The practice of medicine has always been considered a respectable profession, but its respectability should guard it from over crowding on the part of those who make a business of it. And, by the way, why should not competition reduce the price of doctors' services as in all other vocations? A good many doctors are nowadays making enormous incomes; even young fellows, with any sort of success, gather in $10,000 or $12,000 per year. This cannot always continue at the rate at which doctors are turned out, unless by the most stringent trade-unionism. We are a too much doctored nation, and the millions pin their faith even more to patent medicines than to reputable physicians. The Medical Record gives the figures:

"The United States has about 60,000,000 of population, nearly 100,000 doctors, 13,091 medical students, and graduates 3,740 students in one year. Germany has 45,000,000 of population, about 30,000 doctors, and graduates 935 students in one year. With relatively less than half as many doctors as America, Germany is already groaning over its surplus. A comparison of the United States with European countries, in whatever way it is made, leads one to think that there is something almost morbid in our medical fecundity."

People of light and leading are certainly learning to take care of their health better than they used. Possibly the enormous number of our doctors find the bulk of their practice among the masses that the less-doctored countries of Europe send over to us.

"LITTLE BO PEEP

had lost her sheep and couldn't tell where to find them." So the old nursery rhyme says, and it goes on to bid her "Leave them alone and they'll come home and bring their tails behind them." All this may be true of lost sheep, but if you have lost your health you cannot afford to leave that alone. It will not come back of its own accord. Some people brag that they never bother about colds. They "let them go the way they came." Alas! too often the victims go—to a consumptive's grave. Until very recently a cure for Consumption, which is universally acknowledged to be scrofula affecting the lungs, would have been looked upon as miraculous, but now people are beginning to realize that the disease is not incurable. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will cure it if taken in time and given a fair trial. This world-renowned remedy will not make new lungs, but it will restore diseased ones to a healthy state when other means have failed. Thousands gratefully testify to this. It is the most potent tonic, or strength restorer, alterative, or blood-cleanser, and nutritive, or flesh builder known to medical science. For Lingering Coughs, Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, "Liver Complaint," and Dyspepsia or Indigestion, it is an unequalled remedy.

DR. SAGE'S CATARRH REMEDY cures the worst cases, no matter of how long standing. 50 cents, by druggists.

DON'T BLAME THE WORLD.

Don't blame the world because the thorns are found among the roses;
The day that breaks in storm may be all sunshine when it closes.
We cannot hope always to meet with fortune's fond caressing,
And that which seems most hard to bear may bring with it a blessing.

The buried seed must rot in earth ere it produce the flower,
And the weak plant to fructify must have both sun and shower;
So man, to gain development, must struggle with life's crosses,
And view with calm philosophy his trials and his losses.

A deadly, pois'nous weed may yield a salve of surest healing;
The sweetest bloom may pois'nous be, although its bane concealing.
Things are not always what they seem, but still 'twas Heaven designed them,
And we should class them all as good and take them as we find them.

Little we know of this brief life, and little of its sequel;
Then let us take in humble trust all that may seem unequal.
God's ways are not our ways, and he should certainly be trusted;
All that is wrong, in his good time, will surely be adjusted.

Woman's Ways.

In nine cases out of ten men are led to believe in God through their faith in some woman and respect for her religion.

The unusual number of flies this summer is an old woman's sign that there will be an unusual amount of sickness.

Take the eighth letter of the alphabet, the fifteenth, and the twentieth, and see what you get.

Mothers who are having hard times making their boys wash their feet at night, are wishing it would turn too cold to go bare-footed.

When a man loses faith in a woman he turns to the world for his comfort; when a woman loses faith in a man she turns to religion.

There never was a woman that couldn't reach up on her shoulder and find a pin.

An Atchison young lady puts her clothes in a refrigerator before she puts them on during the hot weather.

"When I take off my corsets," said a woman yesterday, "I feel as if something had happened to me that made me fall altogether."

For the Complexion.

If you want to know how to make the most of your complexion follow these rules:
Don't use a coarse towel unless you have a cast-iron jaw.

Don't be afraid of a steam or hot bath just before retiring.

Don't use a sponge or linen wash-rag in the bath, flannel is best, and never wash immediately after coming out of the cold air or hot sun.

Don't try lotions that you read or hear about on the face. If you must experiment, study the effect on your arm or knee.

Don't be rash enough to use any cosmetic containing white lead or arsenic, unless you are anxious to disfigure yourself.

Don't try to do without a cake of white castile soap, a bottle of glycerine or cold cream, a box of borax or spirits of ammonia to soften the water, and a bottle of benzoin for the weekly cleansing.

Don't meddle with wrinkles, for they are as inevitable as gray hair or old age.

Don't forget that sea air is a natural restorative, and that whatever tones up the system will beautify the complexion; hence, the value of wholesome, simple food, good hours, and temperance.

Cooking a Chicken.

Housekeepers do not always understand that a chicken, after the animal heat leaves the body, is not fit for food in less than twenty-four hours. During this time the muscles are stiffened by the rigor that succeeds directly after the departure of animal heat in all animals, and are tougher than they are at any time previous. In Virginia and many parts of the South, cooks kill and dress poultry with great rapidity, and plunge the pieces of chicken, while they are still warm with animal heat, into the frying kettle. This secures the tender, succulent dishes of fried chicken which are justly the pride of the old Virginia cook. There is something repulsive to the Northern housewife in serving up a fowl that was perhaps a few moments before strutting about, the pride of the yard. An equally good and tender dish of chicken may be attained by keeping the fowl till the muscles relax, and it is in prime condition for food. In fact, only by the rapid process of frying can a chicken be cooked done before the muscles stiffen. This the Southern cook knows, and she never attempts to fricassee or roast a fowl that has not been hung at least twenty-four hours.

FROM SIG. MARTINEZ, CONCERT SOLO PIANIST.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business

THEMIS: published weekly, by A. J. Johnston & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

There has been much of politics in Sacramento county recently. We had first a Democratic primary, in which some who claimed to be Republicans participated. Their acts we do not approve of and feel they have hurt the Republican organization they claimed to represent. Our Democratic friends then passed through the throes of a County Convention. Particularly why they went to so much trouble we can not understand. They met and accomplished nothing. The Republican County Convention presented its ticket to the electors; it is satisfactory. It is said there will be a movement of independence, by parties who inaugurated such a movement four years ago. It will, however, meet its merited fate. There is but one way by which these movements will be encountered. A man who accepts a nomination upon the Republican ticket must stand by his party, and to him it will be said by the governing committee he must run as a candidate upon the Republican ticket or as a candidate of a side-show. We are aware that when the Republican Committee of Sacramento county four years ago announced that no man who had received a nomination at the hands of the Republican Convention should accept preferments from side conventions, it was regarded as a bold political movement; it, however, won, and will win. If we mistake not, the policy of the Republican Committee of this county will be that those who have received Republican nominations must stand with the party or fall by it, and it will not be that side issues will be permitted to interfere with the course of a party of the strength the Republicans here have.

We suggest that the State Central Committee of the Republican party pursue the course that has been outlined in Sacramento county. Men nominated by such a convention as met in this city this week, should not be permitted to accept nominations from outside conventions. If the Republican party has not the power to carry its candidates through successfully, it would be better we allowed a hand-in-hand fight. However it was in the case of Mr. Swift, who ran for Governor in 1886, he was defeated that he was not upon the American ticket, and the people made a mistake. Of Mr. Bartlett we have no word of adverse criticism. Of Mr. Waterman, we never have believed the people of this State intended he should be their Governor. It came about that Bartlett died; that Swift had been defeated; that Waterman had accepted side nominations which Swift declined, and that Waterman ran ahead of the principal candidate upon his ticket.

The ticket that has been presented by the Republican State Convention is exceptionally good. While we believed a week ago that the nomination for Governor would fall to Mr. Morrow, we realize the entire propriety of the selection of Col. Markham. Last week we reviewed his life career; it is creditable, and we doubt not that in his selection as chief magistrate, the people will receive full value. There has been in this instance a very plain demonstration of what cannot be accomplished by coarse attacks upon an individual who is a candidate for important office. Col. Markham, from the very moment he aspired to the nomination for Governor, was subjected to brutal attacks from journals of his own party. Against him, anonymous cards were written, and personality was indulged in. We are always disposed to judge the effect of matters of this kind, by regarding ourselves as judge and jury, and believe that the people generally viewed the matter as we did. The nomination is one to be commended as creditable to the judgment of the convention. J. B. Reddick, the nominee for Lieutenant-Governor, has been prominent in politics for years, and twice represented Calaveras county in the Assembly. In 1884 he was selected as a Presidential elector in the interest of Blaine and Logan, and led his ticket. We are personally acquainted with Mr. Reddick, and know him to be an active, earnest, and able man—a man of the people. William H. Beatty has been renominated for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. It is an excellent selection. Judge Beatty served when a young man as District Judge in the State of Nevada, and afterward was elected a Justice of the Supreme Court of that State. Two years ago he was elected Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of California, and his career upon the bench has been satisfactory. For Associate Justices there have been nominated Ralph C. Harrison, of San Francisco, a lawyer very well known; Chas. H. Garoutte, of Yolo, and J. J. De Haven. Judge Garoutte was born in Yolo county, and soon after admission to the bar was chosen District Attorney. In 1884 he was elected Superior Judge, and was the youngest man who ever filled so dignified a judicial position in this State. During his term he has presided in some of the most important cases that have arisen in the State, and enjoys the confidence of the people and of the members of the bar. J. J. De Haven, the nominee for Associate Justice for the short term, represented the counties of Del Norte and Klamath in the 19th and 20th sessions of the Legislature as a State Senator, and in the Assembly, represented Humboldt in the 18th session. On November 6, 1888, he was elected to Congress, and is now a member of that body. He is a lawyer of ability, and will carry good judgment to the Supreme Court bench. E. G. Waite has been nominated for Secretary of State. There is no concealment the nomination of Mr. Waite was intended as a rebuke to the political interference of Mr. Justice Field. The circumstances are these: That Mr. Waite wrote a magazine article condemnatory of the killing of Judge Terry; that he had been presented for appointment for a Federal position in San Francisco; that Mr. Justice Field brought about a non-confirmation by the Federal executive. The sentiment of the people of this State cannot be misunderstood in the matter of the interference by the judicial department in matters political, and the rebuke is just. For Controller, there has been nominated E. P. Colgan, of Sonoma, a young man, who has been recognized in the community in which he has been reared as of worth. For State Treasurer, J. R. McDonald, of Stanislaus, has been nominated. Mr. McDonald is a farmer and prominent citizen of San Joaquin valley. For Attorney-General, W. H. H. Hart, of San Francisco, has been nominated. Mr. Hart has a brilliant military record, and his law practice has been considerable. He has been identified with many of the important causes that have transpired. For Surveyor-General we are presented with Theodore Reichert, who has filled the office the last four years with satisfaction. L. Brown, of Solano, is the nominee for the Clerk of the Supreme Court, and J. W. Anderson, of San Francisco, for Superintendent of Public Instruction. For Congressman-at-large, there have been named W.

W. Morrow, of San Francisco, and J. C. Campbell, of Stockton. From the 2d District, G. G. Blanchard, of El Dorado; and from the 3d, Joseph McKenna, of Solano. For Railroad Commissioner from the First District, William Beckman of this city has been named, and J. W. Rea has been selected from the Third District. For members of the State Board of Equalization, there have been nominated from the Second District, L. C. Morehouse, of Alameda; Daniel Cole, of Sierra, from the Third, and J. R. Hibbrom, of Monterey, from the Fourth. We have no hesitation in saying that the ticket thus far named and those who will be subsequently placed upon it, will be successful, and concerning the nominees who have been announced, no objection can be raised.

There are wonders in earth-productive qualities. We know not yet of the true philosophy of the agricultural possibilities. When we read Prince Kropotkin's article in Forum, on the possibilities of agriculture, a new light was thrown by this practical Russian on a subject that has been little understood by the masses, even the select and philosophical few. The doctrine of Malthus in his essay on the "Principle of Population," is met and demolished in a most artistic manner, with philosophical and practical demonstrations. While Malthus attempted to prove there is no equality according to natural laws, and that there is no room at the feast of nature for a too rapid population, the observing Russian has investigated the subject of production and given a brief summary of his labors in the article mentioned. Even if the population of our civilized communities were increased tenfold, the earth's resources cultivated by ten times more workers would not refuse to supply them with all their wants. A practical illustration might be taken in our midst from the Chinese quarters. These people, with their frugal habits and economical ways, have a faculty of producing three or four times as much from the same quantity of soil, that any of our own people accomplish. Go to any of the Chinese gardens and witness the means they use to enrich the soil, and observe the response that nature gives. Irrigation is of course one of the secrets of the productiveness of otherwise non-fertile soil. There are still wonders realized by the market gardeners of Paris, Orleans, London and other big cities. The Paris marais have a system wherein the earliest and best vegetables are produced by warming the air and the soil. Large quantities of manure is mixed with the soil to create heat. In addition to this warming pipes are inserted under the soil. This was a revelation in horticulture. So practical has become this system, that renters embody in their contracts of lease that the "made soil" added by the tenant shall be the property of the tenant, and removable at the termination of his lease. Yet this portable soil is not the latest departure in agriculture. The very latest is the watering of the soil with special liquids containing special microbes. Chemical manures, without organic manure is not sufficient to produce the best results. It has been discovered that certain microbes in the soil are a necessary condition for the growth of plants. Thus some of the most practical of these foreign agriculturists, French and Russian, actually sow microbes for the purpose of developing and fertilizing the soil. This new method has not become general, however, and further experiments are necessary to render it practical. The greatest modern conquests in gardening and agriculture have been developed in the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, where the products of thirteen acres will greatly exceed those of an ordinary English farm of thirteen hundred acres. It is demonstrated that the soil can be made to produce in any climate, and upon any character of soil. Humanity has willed it, and the laws of nature will always respond when properly invoked in behalf of the needs of man.

True Life.

What is the life that we seek and hope for? Is it a mere existence, or is it a search for conscious happiness—a life that we feel to be a blessing to ourselves and others? We are each seeking life in different ways. Are we seeking it aright? Are you seeking it aright, man or woman, who are gathering up treasure which will fade and rust; who say: "Give us wealth, easy living, enough to do as we please with, and we ask for no more?" This obtained, do they enjoy true life? Do they not rather find happiness still beyond their grasp? Do they not find that there are chambers in their soul which wealth and fame can never fill? The complaining, the fault-finding, who think no lot on earth so hard as their own; who forget all God's blessings and goodness to them; forgetting how very many things they have to thank Him for, the friends and the love which He has given to them, and which they so little deserve; forgetting that every cloud has its rainbow, every storm dies away in whispers of peace; knowing not in their blindness, that He chasteneth them in love; that the griefs and wrongs of life are what makes life worth the living, and which makes us strong in that hour when our boats must leave the shore never to return; which gives us the blessed privilege to say triumphantly, as we cross the dark water: "Our conflicts and trials lie far back in the past, but the victory in them is ours, gained once and forever."

It is the memory of grief that makes us patient and true. Through it the knowledge comes to us that life is not a play, but that it is something nobler and better than we have known before; that true living consists not in heaping up gold—in building fine houses; that no true soul can live in these alone. God has given us wants and aspirations these can never supply. It is the stern realities of life that purify us; it is life's sorrows which make us better. Oh, ye who are sinking under burdens heavy and grievous to be borne, know ye not they are but blessings in disguise? Think, that if now the shadows are dark around you, the day cometh, and the night will flee before the morning sun; and you will come forth with a new beauty in your souls, a new joy in your hearts, which the idle pleasures of life can never give! Ye who are sitting in darkness, seeing not the beauty of this earth, rise up and thank God for your burdens, and bear them bravely, and you will see your troubles disappear like the beautiful autumnal sun when it sinks behind clouds of burnished gold, leaving traces of new beauty in its pathway! In the future your course will be pleasant, and your destiny inconceivably grand.

Atmospheric Air a Hygienic Agent.

It is strange that people should sicken and die for the want of air, when there is a superabundance provided in nature, yet such is the case. Thousands die daily, whose ailments are the result, directly or indirectly, of deficient respiration. There are few, if any, who breathe as much as the laws of the human system demand. People stay indoors too much, where heaven's fresh, health-giving breezes cannot freely find their way, and they suffer in consequence. Meanwhile, every tiny grass blade, every leaf and bough, and every living thing that runs or crawls, is luxuriating and being developed in nature's element. This lamentable deprivation arises from a want of knowledge in regard to the importance of the function of respiration. All the life functions become deranged if this is not properly carried on. It is the process, in all animals, by which the blood is brought under the influence of atmospheric air, and thus vitalized and purified. The human lung is made up of ramifications of air-tubes and cells, to which they convey the air. Their number is variously estimated at from 18,000,000 to 100,000,000. Millions of little capillaries all over the system are busily employed in taking up worn out, waste particles of matter, which are then sent by larger vessels to the heart, and thence to the lungs (to be cast out), where the veins divide and subdivide, or anastomose, in fine capillaries, forming a complete network on the outer surface of the air-cells. The cell walls are so thin as to present no impediment to a chemical interchange, and the oxygen of the air in the cells readily passes through these substances, effecting a necessary chemical change in the chyle of the blood—which is prepared from the food—before it is capacitated to nourish and rebuild the body, and the impurities of the blood are given in exchange and thrown off in the form of carbonic acid gas in the breath. In accordance with the laws of chemical affinity, the amount of carbon eliminated is proportionate to that of the oxygen taken into the blood. Hence every part of the lungs, at each respiration, should be fully expanded by air, and that of the purest quality, or the life current will return to the heart to be sent over the system insufficiently vitalized and purified to make strong, healthy tissue. An impure, weakened condition of the system, thus induced, renders it extremely impressible to injury, and liable to various diseases, such as scrofula, etc. When a part of the lungs is inactive—not distended by air—it soon becomes tuberculated; the air-tubes and cells fill with foreign material, and are ever after unfitted for the purpose of respiration. Upon any slight provocation, as taking cold, these tubercles irritate the surrounding substance of the lung, and that dreadful disease, consumption, generally closes the scene. Pulmonary affections, if taken in season, in the majority of cases, may be checked by inflating the lungs often in the open air. Many, who thought themselves destined to fill consumptive's graves, have grown strong and healthy by this practice. The inspirations should be very slow and gentle at first, and gradually increased in power, as it can be borne. Some cannot take a deep, full breath, without discomfort, when they commence, but by making gentle efforts once, twice, thrice or more daily, unless their lungs are badly diseased, they soon overcome the difficulty, and find themselves growing broad-chested and vigorous.

Joaquin Miller on Mount Shasta.

Alone as God, and white as a winter moon, Mount Shasta starts up sudden and solitary from the heart of the great black forests of Northern California.

You would hardly call Mount Shasta a part of the Sierras. You would say, rather, that it is the great white tower of some ancient and eternal wall, with nearly all of the white walls overthrown.

It has no rival. There is not even a snow-crowned subject in sight of its dominion. A shining pyramid in mail of everlasting frosts and ice, the sailor sometimes, in a day of singular clearness, catches glimpses of it from the sea, a hundred miles away to the west; and it may be seen from the dome of the Capitol, 340 miles distant. The emigrant coming from the East beholds the snowy, solitary pillar from afar out on the arid sage-brush plains, and lifts his hands in silence as in answer to a sign.

Column upon column of storm-stained tamarack, strong, tossing pines, and warlike looking firs have rallied here. They stand with their backs against this mountain, frowning down dark-browed, and confronting the face of the Saxon. The defy the advance of civilization into their ranks. What if these dark and splendid columns, a hundred miles in depth, should be the last to go down in America! What if it should be the old guard gathered here, marshalled around their emperor in plumes and armor that may die but never surrender!

Ascend the mountain; stand against the snow above the upper belt of pines and take a glance below. Toward the sea, nothing but the black and unbroken forest. Mountains, it is true, dip and divide, and break the monotony as the waves break up the sea; yet it is still the sea, still the unbroken forest, black and magnificent. To the south, the landscape sinks and declines gradually, but still maintains its column of dark-plumed grenadiers, till the Sacramento valley is reached, nearly a hundred miles away. Silver rivers run here, the sweetest in the world. They wind and wind among the rocks and mossy roots, with California lilies, and the yew with scarlet berries, dipping in the water, and trout idling in the eddies and cool places by the basketful. On the east, the forest still keeps up unbroken rank till the Pitt River valley is reached; and even there it surrounds the valley and locks it up tight in its black embrace. To the north, it is true, Shasta valley makes quite a dimple in the sable sea, and men plow there, and Mexicans drive their mules or herd their mustang ponies on the open plain. But the valley is limited, surrounded by the forest, confined and imprisoned.

Look intently down among the black and rolling hills forty miles away to the west, and here and there you will see a haze of cloud or smoke hung up above the trees; or, driven by the wind that is coming from the sea, it may drag and creep along as if tangled in the tops.

These are mining camps. Men are there, down in these dreadful cañons, out of the sight of the sun, swallowed up, buried in the impenetrable gloom of the forest, toiling for gold. Each one of these camps is a world of itself. History, romance, tragedy, poetry, in every one of them. They are connected together, and reach the outer world only by a narrow little pack trail, stretching through the timber, stringing round the mountains, barely wide enough to admit of footmen and little Mexican mules, with their apparajos to pass in single file.

But now, the natives of these forests. I lived with them for years. You do not see the smoke of their wigwams through the trees. They do not smite the mountain rocks for gold, nor fell the pines, nor roil up the waters and ruin them for the fishermen. All this magnificent forest is their estate. The Great Spirit made this mountain first of all, and gave it to them, they say, and they have possessed it ever since. They preserve the forest, keep out the fires, for it is the park of their deer.

SUNSHINE.

Sir Arthur Helps, in his delightful volume, "Companions of My Solitude," tells us of his summer happiness in a pine wood, where he fell into the pleasantest train of thought and enjoyed a sense of ease which seemed to show the possibility of all care being driven away from the world some day. And he adds: "It was very warm, without which nothing is beautiful to me."

I suppose the comparative rarity of warmth and sunshine makes them all the dearer to us in this shivery and wayward climate, and Sir Arthur expresses a feeling with which most of my readers will sympathize. Not all, indeed. One meets sometimes, even in England, with men and women who seem to have a grudge against the sun. No sooner does that kindest of friends put forth a little genial power than these good people appear to be as restless and uncomfortable as the polar bear in the Zoo. They walk upon the shady side of the road as though they feared sunstroke, and the emphasis of their expressions would be too strong if they lived in Calcutta or Hong Kong.

No doubt, in torrid climates the traveler will often say with literal truth what Hamlet said metaphorically, that he is too much in the sun. Scorching heat is intolerable, or nearly so, as the churlish chiding of the wintry wind, and life in an African desert is as unpleasant as life on an iceberg. Even in this country, in which a fire is often needed at midsummer—I am sitting by one now in this rainy month of June—the sun has been known to put forth unwonted power, laborers in the field have died, fine ladies have gasped upon sofas, and the land has glowed like a furnace. "Such warmth," to quote the rather tumid language of Thomson, "blasts Fancy's blooms and withers even the soul;" and he adds, with some measure of truth and more of poetical license, that in this heat "distressful Nature pants," that "the very streams look languid afar," and that "all from pole to pole is undistinguished blaze." No doubt England has witnessed such heat, just as in 1703 it was the witness of a tempest that swept away large mansions, buried a bishop beneath the ruins of his palace, and destroyed hundreds of lives; but scorching blasts are as rare in this climate as tropical hurricanes, and a man may live a long life without suffering from either. It is the want of sunshine, and not the excess of it, that marks our islands. How much, I wonder, of the chronic discontent of Ireland is due to legislation past or present, and how much to a damp atmosphere and a cloudy sky?

The Spaniards, who have a proverb "That which keeps out the cold keeps out the heat," wear their cloaks in summer, and we, for a different reason, can rarely, for many weeks together, wear light clothing. Scarcely have we thrown off winter garments—never more needed than in spring—than we are forced to resume them again, so chary is the sun of 'his favors. That is why, when sunshine does come, we should open our hearts and windows to it. In the physical as in the spiritual world, light is essential to life, and the more we have of it the better. Yet, too commonly, we shut it out from our souls by prejudice, and from our houses by Venetian blinds.

It is my belief that many a brave deed and many a work of imagination owes its conception to the stimulating and joyous influence of sunshine. On a glad day in summer the spirit of joy is everywhere—the spirit, too, of aspiration, and "we feel that we are greater than we know." Burton says a good prospect will ease melancholy; but he might have added that the soothing influence of the fairest scene is largely dependent upon sunshine. Let the reader recall the landscapes that have given him most delight, and I think he will remember that they were never associated with dull days. The serene and restful beauty of nature under a summer sun is very different from the same nature when surveyed in a macintosh and beneath the shelter of an umbrella! A pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun, said a wise man of old, and the poets have reiterated this truth time without number. But we prose-born folk, whom the gods have not made poetical, may be as susceptible to the delights of sunshine as the versemen who commemorate them. Possibly it is to our advantage that we can not sing. Poets inspired by the sun should possess, one might imagine, lucidity and strength; but there are some young poets nowadays so feebly incoherent and foolishly obscure that they appear to be under lunar influences.

When Milton lost his sight he prayed that the celestial light might shine inward and all his powers irradiate; and this reminds me that there is what another poet calls a "sunshine of the breast," which can make our homes happy when the shadows of life deepen and the heart craves after more than nature, with all her riches, is able to supply—

He that has light in his own clear breast
May sit in center and enjoy bright day;
But he that hides a dark soul and foul thoughts
Benighted walks under the mid-day sun:
Himself is his own dungeon.

THAT BABY.

This city is a strange place. Wealth and want stand side by side. I know I shall make a large sum of money by a business arrangement to-day, and I intend to take Clara to the opera this evening.

A woman hurries past with a child in her arms. What a woeful expression on her face!

I feel a thrill of anguish as I look at her. I was led into this train of reflection by my morning's walk to my place of business. The woman's face seemed to hover before me in the air.

It was 1:30 before I came to the office. Even then I was not myself.

As I pushed the door open, I half expected to see it in my office in actual bodily presence. I had left my boy Shadrac in charge as usual. As I cast my glance toward the desk, I missed his shock head; but looking about me, I spied it lower down, and saw that he was sitting on the floor in a corner with something in his arms and a very uncomfortable expression on his face.

In a moment more I saw that what he held was a baby.

"Hello!" cried I, "what's that?"

"Young un," said Shadrac.

"Whose? Where did it come from?" I cried.

"A woman came along," said Shadrac, "and says she: 'You Mr. Paddock's boy?' Says I, 'Yes.' Says she, 'Catch hold, and hold the child till I come back,' and she ain't never come back. I dunno what she meant by it."

"What kind of a woman was she?" I asked.

"She had on a shawl," said the boy. "She was a turriner."

I looked at the child. It was very pretty and very clean. I felt attracted toward it. I began to wonder whether it would be right for me to adopt a child, with my family; whether Mrs. Paddock would be willing that I should do so. I felt doubtful of that. Her own babe was care enough for her.

What should I do? I would send for my friend, Professor Grill, who had an office in the same building. He knew my wife well.

The result was the hasty arrival of the professor with a lancet, under the impression that I had been taken with a fit of some kind.

"The old story, my dear fellow," he said; "the old story. Beware of this child; give it to the proper authorities at once. I'll go with you. I must save you from the overwhelming yearnings of your own too charitable heart, my benevolent friend."

I went with him.

I was glad to reach the police station. Shadrac told his tale. I corroborated it. The child was registered in a book. My statement and address were recorded, and the deserted infant was taken away by an old woman.

We had reached the office as he spoke.

"Ah, there they come!" screamed a voice.

"Oh, they haven't got him!" cried another.

"I gave him to the boy there!" cried the first.

"You little villain, where's the baby?"

"Horace, speak—my child?" sobbed the other, clinging to my arm.

It was my wife who clung to me; the baby's maid, Nora, who shook Shadrac.

"Baby!" said I, grasping; "what baby?—where?—when?—which?"

"Oh," said my wife, "Nora and I were going to B—, and I sent Nora first to wait in your office for me. I had some shopping to do, and the baby shrieks so, and she—oh, I'll give her warning—she left the baby with the boy while she went out. Where is the angel?—oh, what have you done with him?"

I sat down on the stairs then. Professor Grill glared and said nothing. Shadrac told the awful tale.

He revealed to my wife that I had given my own baby to the police under the impression that it was a stranger; and as my wife was of the belief that this was a thing that, once done, could not be undone, we had a fine time of it.

I don't like to recur to those moments when I made explanations to the police, and excited their suspicion thereby. It is in vain to point out to her that the babies are all exactly alike, and that I did not notice what the child wore; she will not listen to reason.

The Stage.

The Princess Dolgorouki is one of the most accomplished violin players in Europe.

Sol Smith Russell will bring out The Tale of a Coat, the new play which Dion Boucicault has prepared for him.

The life of John McCullough, which Joseph Haworth is writing, will, it is said, be ready for publication in a few weeks.

Mr. Gus Williams is now writing several new songs for the new farce comedy You and I, in which he will star next season.

A man named Kautor, in Eischen, Germany, has been discovered to have a wonderful tenor voice, and it will be carefully cultivated.

The pretty song which De Wolf Hopper sings in the third act of Castles in the Air, entitled "This Little Pig Went to Market," has made a distinct hit.

A niece of the great actress Rachel is soon to go on the stage. She is the wife of an Englishman, and having been reared in England, she speaks English perfectly.

A melodrama called Keystone and Three Links is promised for production some time this fall. The author claims it will prove of especial interest to Free Masons and Odd Fellows.

A new voice has been discovered, according to the following: Girl (at a dramatic agency)—I want to get a position in a chorus, if possible. Agent—What is your voice? Girl—Soapralto.

Miss Ida E. Bowser is the first colored graduate from the department of music of the University of Pennsylvania. She is the author of some good sonatas, and is an accomplished violinist.

If Sara Bernhardt cannot be turned from her fell purpose to play "Romeo," we beg leave to call her attention to the fact that Turkish women eat rose leaves with butter to secure plumpness.

"Can you sing?" inquired the dramatic agent of a hopeful genius. "Like a bird," came the answer. "Dance?" "Out of sight, eagerly replied the applicant. "How about your stage experience?" "Me? Well, look here, young feller, hain't you goin' a little too far? What's der use of experience when de public is after novelties? See?"

While the future of Italian opera, or opera in Italian, properly speaking, was under discussion among a group of amusement seekers, says the New York Star, a theatrical manager, who has drawn heavily on his bank account several times to make up a deficit on operatic ventures, said that the prima donna business was responsible for the decline of Italian opera. "The Patti had more to do with it than anybody or anything," he continued. "Do you know that Patti could have saved Mapleson on a dozen occasions, if she would have appeared in a new opera or taken a new role? But she will not consent to do it. I don't think she has sung a new song in twenty years, until this last season with Abbey. Of course, she knew she was on solid ground in the old operas, and it was wise for her reputation that she should make no experiments. But for Italian opera—well, we have none now, and that tells the story."

Book Chat.

I wrote a book. It took the town by storm,
'Twas of a lass, a villain, and a lover.
I must confess it made me rather warm
To have it said "it sold upon its cover."

There is some inquiry as to the whereabouts of Edgar Saltus, but it does not take on the form of wild anxiety.

It is announced that the author of "Troth," "A Dreamer of Dreams," and "Toxar," is Mr. J. Shields Nicholson, Professor of political economy in the University of Edinburgh. This has long been an open secret on the other side of the sea.

Robert Louis Stevenson will probably return to London in October. About that time he will wind up his affairs in Scotland. He intends to sell off his house furniture, carry his books with him and fix his home permanently in Samoa. His island estate is said to be very lovely, with no less than six waterfalls on it.

The fourth number of the popular and handsome Odd Number series of translations from foreign authors issued by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, will be Giovanni Verga's story of "The House by the Medlar Tree." The translation is by Mary A. Craig, and the story will be prefaced by an introduction by William Dean Howells.

Sir Walter Scott's "Journal" is to appear in the autumn. Mr. David Douglas will edit it, with elaborate explanatory notes and illustrative extracts from unpublished sources, including the reminiscences, in manuscript, of James Skene, one of Scott's most intimate friends. There are also letters from Carlyle and Lockhart. The work will form two volumes, containing nearly double the amount of matter given by Lockhart.

The book conference at Antwerp will be held this year on August 7, 8 and 9, in the rooms of the Cercle Artistique. The Secretary of the organizing committee announces that "We now possess the adhesion of 280 notable persons in different countries. * * * Besides these adherents, some of the persons invited inform us of the impossibility of their attending the session of the conference, sending at the same time proofs of their interest and vows for the success of the meeting."

The famous French publishing house of Firmin-Didot has undertaken to do something new in the way of advertising its publications. In a dozen large show-cases, resting upon movable iron supports easily folded, it is sending samples of its wares all over Europe, particularly to cities where French books and styles of publications are not well known. Advertisements in the local newspapers inform the inhabitants that on such a day and in such a hotel the exposition will be open, and the employee who accompanies the exhibition furnishes all necessary explanations. Nothing is sold on the spot, but specimens are to be seen and orders can be given. If this perambulating exhibition proves successful for the book and printing industry, it will be tried in other departments of trade.

The Kreutzer Sonata is a bitter satirical attack upon the marriage relation. Under the guise of a superfine Christianity, Tolstoi strikes directly at the very foundation of all society, and altogether belies the teachings of Christianity and Christ. There is no sentiment too sacred, sweet or dear to man that is not here ruthlessly violated. Marriage is scoffed at and human love is branded as a weakness and a crime. And this new code which the disciples of Tolstoi are lauding to the skies, includes the following principles as clearly defined in Tolstoi's explanation which closely followed the first appearance of the book. "That marriage is a sin. That man is a beast. That woman is absolutely vile. That the mother's love is an animal sensual passion. That marriage is but a licensed prostitution or a liaison at best; it is not a progress, but a fall. That chastity and celibacy are the Christian ideals of life. That a Christian marriage never was or never could be, as Christ did not marry nor did his disciples." The above are the vagaries of a frenzied Russian.

There is something pathetic in the failure of the wits of political life. Thomas Corwin never ceased to attribute to his reputation of being funny his inability to compass the highest honors. He felt that his abilities and services entitled him to any honor within the gift of the people. He rose to be Secretary of the Treasury in Filmore's cabinet, but that did not satisfy him. He died feeling that if he had not been so funny, if he had not indulged in his exquisite ridicule of the Michigan militia general who attacked General Harrison, he might have been President. Corwin was immeasurably greater than his reputation, and his fun almost always helped out his serious argument.

"What a newspaper man writes is a mighty poor index to what he thinks," says Judge Brisbin to a St. Paul Pioneer Press reporter. "I remember when I was in college a friend of mine wrote a tale of woe entitled 'My Mother's Grave,' for the college paper. The story had a temperance moral attached, and Charley was so proud of his literary effort that he sent a copy of the thing to a young lady in New Haven (the Judge is a Yale man, class of '46), and a few evenings afterward he went up to the young lady's home to spend the evening. It was Christmas eve, and there was a big bowl of egg-nogg out in the dining-room. Soon after we arrived the young lady took me out quietly and gave me an introduction to the fluid, but cautioned me to not allow my friend to find out that there was anything of the sort in the house, as she did not wish to offend an author of temperance literature. Several times during the evening I made sub rosa pilgrimages to where the holiday beverage was located, and every time my friend got within range of my breath, fragrant with nutmeg, spices and Jeffersonian simplicity, he would give me a piteous look with an interrogation point in each eye. He was so mad when we left that it was all he could do to bid our hostess a civil adieu, and when we reached the street he wanted to throw rocks at the house. It will not do to take it for granted that you newspaper men always believe what you write.

Marie Bashkirtseff.

Some clever reviewer has again been sipping his coffee over the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," and hit upon a passage that seems as if it must have been written since the world has known poor Marie Bashkirtseff, rather than before. For that matter, however, there are plenty of lives it might exemplify. Keep in your mind the wonderful creation of Chatterton that Wilson Barrett gave us last season. Read the lives of numerous other gentle natures—too gentle, and yet too strong for this life. Then you will see the truth of Dr. Holmes' picture of certain poets, whom he likens to a kind of blondes that are such simply by deficiency of coloring matter—negative or washed blondes, arrested by nature on the way to become albinos: "Their want of mental coloring matter makes them sensitive to those impressions which stronger minds neglect or never feel at all. Many of them die young, and all of them are tinged with melancholy. There is no more beautiful illustration of the principle of compensation which marks the divine benevolence, than the fact that some of the holiest lives, and some of the sweetest songs are the growth of the infirmity which unfits its subject for the rougher duties of life. * * * You remember the same thing, in other words, somewhere in Kirke White's poems. It is the burden of the plaintive songs of all these sweet albino poets. I shall die and be forgotten, and the world will go on just as if I had never been; and yet, how I have loved! how I have longed! how I have aspired! And, so singing, their eyes grow brighter and brighter, and their features thinner and thinner, until at last the veil of flesh is threadbare, and, still singing, they drop it and pass onward."

Now, do not the wide-open, questioning eyes of the little Russian girl peer into yours? Do you recall these words of hers: "This is the thought that terrifies me always—to live, to have so much ambition, to suffer, to weep, to struggle, and in the end to be forgotten as if I had never existed."

Woman Unhappy Without Love.

I am curious to know whether a woman into whose life love has never entered can ever have been what I should call happy. I do not think so. She may have found the quiet garden of which Content keeps the keys. She may be reconciled to her fate, and console herself by thinking how much better off she is than if she were unhappily married; but such dull resignation is not even first cousin to the rapture of joy. I am old-fashioned, perhaps, in my ideas, but I honestly think that real happiness comes to a woman only hand in hand with love.

When she begins to feel that, with one man in it, the room is full, and empty when he is gone, no matter how many others may remain, she begins to be tremulously, deliciously, deliciously happy. But that is only the beginning, and if love holds happiness by the hand, fear stands at the other elbow. A word too many or too few—a smile that does not go her way—and the girl suffers as much as she has enjoyed. Her very soul hungers within her for some dear certainty. And when that comes—when her troth is pledged—is that her happiest moment? She does not think so then, for she is looking forward to her bridal morning.

The day of days comes at last, and the new life begins. Is that, then, the happiest moment? Hardly, for the very most loving people who ever lived are not quite one, to begin with, and they must learn to live together. A year—a year of mutual forbearance; of getting well acquainted—a happy year, and now they look into each other's eyes fearlessly. They are one at last, and for all time!

Surely that is the happiest moment? I had made up my mind to say so, but is it?

Robinson's Circus.

John Robinson, the king among circus men, is coming to Sacramento with his gigantic circus and menagerie, on August 23—one week from to-day. This will be a great day for the people of Sacramento and its vicinity, as this circus is, in all probability, the best one now traveling in the United States. Several new and attractive features are promised which will make the show alike enjoyable to the old as well as to the young. The following we clip from one of our exchanges:

LIFE IN A SHOW TENT.

John Robinson sat in the door of the big tent last Saturday afternoon watching the people come in. The attendance was proving much larger than anybody had expected for the second day, and perhaps that was the reason why he was good-natured enough to answer a good many personal questions which a reporter ventured to put to him.

"Yes, the business to-day far exceeds my expectations," he said, "and is going to be far in excess of any second day's business in Portland. It shows, I suppose, that the people are getting educated up to good performances, and know a good one when they see it."

"Many people have an idea that the new country is the best for circuses. This is a great mistake. The more people go to circuses the more they want to go. It is the same with me about a theater. I have gone to theaters all my life, but I should just as soon think of going without my meals as not to go to the theater. So it is with the circus. I have more people at my show where I go every year than when I undertake to branch out into new places. Receipts of $500 and $600 at a performance looked as large to managers ten years ago as that many thousands now."

Mr Robinson explained the circus history of the family. There is no name in the country more thoroughly identified with the sawdust ring than his. The original Robinson brothers were three—John, Aleck and James. It was in 1836 that "Old John" Robinson, then a boy driving mules on a canal boat, ran away from home and joined a circus then showing in Boston, in the capacity of groom, at a salary of $8 per month. Four or five years after this he had risen in capability so rapidly that he was able to form a partnership with a man named Foster, and opened a show in New Orleans, doing some of the big heavy horse pieces. In this enterprise he spent all his money and went in debt some $100,000. According to the practice of the times, he was arrested for debt and sentenced to imprisonment. He managed to escape and took refuge in the swamps, returning stealthily from time to time to the city for the necessities of life. In after years, when he became more prosperous, he squared up all these accounts. He ran his circus there until the present John was big enough to take it off his hands.

"The enterprise of handling a circus has come to be so large and expensive that there are to-day only four truly great shows—those of Barnum, Forepaugh, Sells Bros. and my own. There are plenty of Jim Crow circuses, but only four big ones. People may not give it much thought, but they spend in the aggregate, for transportation, feed, salaries, materials, etc., a sum which will reach high up in the millions. Take, for instance, the expense we are to here. Of course, expenses of all kinds are higher here than in the East. Thus, the license in Cincinnati is $25 for a week's performance. Here they ask us $600 or $700, and the best we could do was $200. This morning I paid the Southern Pacific $5,000 for transportation. This, also, has a bearing on the common idea that a circus takes an enormous amount of money out of a town, as a man was saying to me to-day. Yesterday was pay-day, and we paid out $7,000 in salaries, of which I am satisfied three-fourths will remain here in town. Three of the ladies bought sealskin sacques at $350 each. Nearly all buy clothes and jewelry. This amount does not include the wages of the laborers, who are paid monthly. A big town like Portland actually receives more money from the circus than it takes out, as you can readily see by figuring up the items of salaries spent, railroad charges and supplies we buy here. Now the people will save their money till they get to San Francisco and then let loose again. Our expenses here, not counting salaries or railroad fares, are $3,000 to $5,000 a day, compared with $1,000 to $1,500 at the East. Things cost more. The oil, provisions, advertising, etc., cost more here than at the East. So also does the repairing of our train, wagons, tents, etc., which we have done. We have about three hundred horses and ponies, and six sleeping cars on our train to carry the musicians, performers and agents.

Piloted by the press agent, Mr. Josephs, a reporter made a tour of the dressing rooms, etc. Next to the entrance are the horses waiting for their cues to go in the ring. Mr. Robinson's thoroughbreds are all noble animals and would be a credit to any fancy breeder. Next comes the wardrobe department, under the supervision of Mrs. Vernon, who explained that it consisted of over 5,000 pieces, including the fancy horse trappings, and is wholly exclusive of the private wardrobes of the performers. These are seen in the dressing rooms, which come next. These are not much unlike those of the stage, except that there is one large tent each for the ladies and the gentlemen, no special room being provided for any particular star. In the ladies' room was found Miss Josie DeMott, the dashing bareback rider. Miss Josie, upon close view, looks every bit as young as she does in the ring, being 20 years old and having a face as winsome and fresh as a country girl.

Mr. Josephs also showed the reporter through the five large stables, with canvas mangers and feed boxes, neatly and comfortably appointed and filled with handsome horses; the kitchen, pantry and dining room, where the laborers are boarded. There is a large wagon containing a range and outfit of cooking utensils, and quite an army of people are fed on the lot in addition to the fifty or sixty at hotels.

The Cafe Royal.

On the southeast corner of J and Seventh streets, was brilliantly opened to the public by H. D. Gamble on Saturday evening last. This enterprise is a new departure from the worn-out conviction that money liberally expended in improvements is thrown away in Sacramento. No expense has been spared in fitting up this elegant place of resort, either in decorations, furniture, upholstery, carpeting, glassware, mirrors, or illumination. The billiard tables, with balls and cues, are all of the very best material and construction which money, aided by long experience in such matters, could procure. In fact, the whole interior is fitted up with the best judgment and the most exquisite taste. We believe that the liberal appreciation of the public will fully endorse and confirm the sound business judgment of the proprietor in his new venture.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The splendid three-act comedy entitled Aunt Jack, will be given by the Palmer Company on August 29th and 30th. The humorous situations cause laughter from the beginning. "Aunt Jack" is a Miss Joan Bryson, a well-to-do maiden lady of a strong-minded school, who comes to town to ask a jury of her countrymen for £5,000 damages as solatium for hopes that have been blighted and matrimonial promises that have been evaded by the fickle Colonel Tavenor, who has jilted her; firstly, because he has discovered her money is "tied up," secondly, because she had been bold enough to sing a vulgar comic song, of the music hall type, at some local "peppy readings." Aunt Jack has a nephew who, for a living, depends upon her bounty, and on what he, Caleb Cornish (Mr. Edward Bell), can earn as a barrister, presumably with very infrequent briefs. Altogether without her knowledge he has married the Colonel's niece, Mildred (Miss Maud Harrison), and expects to share his fortune when he shall have departed to a world where colonels are unknown. "Aunt Jack" consults this nephew on her case, instructs him to support her claims, and, even when the marriage is made known to her, scorns the suggestion to abandon her action because of his relationship to the defendant. At this nephew's chambers she encounters another barrister, Berkeley Brue, who has been retained by the Colonel for his defense, and who, little dreaming she is the plaintiff in the action, falls desperately in love with her, and is encouraged to believe that his proposal of marriage will be accepted. It will be seen here that a pretty piece of complication and confusion of cross purposes and awkward entanglement of strife between love and duty has been prepared for the trial, which occupies the whole of the third act. The nephew has to denounce the defendant, whose good will he is most anxious to secure; and Brue has to cross-examine the plaintiff, who has won his heart, and whom he is desirous to make his wife. The result of the trial is that the lady gets £2,000 damages, the verdict being arrived at without their leaving the box. On Tuesday night, Captain Swift; Wednesday matinee, Jim, the Penman; Wednesday night, Aunt Jack.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, and State of California. In the matter of the estate of John Kohler, deceased.

It appearing to the Court from the petition this day filed and presented by John H. Sawyer, the executor of the estate of John Kohler, deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate belonging to said estate, to pay the debts, expenses and charges of administration:

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate appear before the said Superior Court, in Department Two, thereof, on Friday, the 19th day of September, A. D., 1890, at 10 o'clock, A. M., on said day, at the Court-room of said Court, in the Court-house in said City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Dated August 15, 1890.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California, to J. H. Coghill and A. J. Coghill, greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the clerk's office of said Court, on the second day of August, 1890, in which action John Ruedy is plaintiff and you are defendants. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, quieting title of plaintiff to the south 110 feet of Lot No. 5, and the south 110 feet of the east quarter of Lot 6, block bounded by D and E, and 6th and 7th Streets, in the City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, State of California, and directing defendants to appear and set forth their title, if any they have to said premises, and that defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim thereto, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of August, A. D., 1890.

Educating a Fireman.

After being recommended by the Fire Commissioners for appointment, the applicant is examined as to his physical qualifications. If they are up to the standard he is turned over to the Civil Service Commissioners for examination as to his knowledge of the common school branches. If he passes he is sent to headquarters, where he enters the School of Instruction of the Life Saving Corps, of which the drill master is Henry W. McAdams. He has had charge of the school since its organization in 1882. No one can go behind his returns; there is not political pull enough in the city to secure the appointment of a man whom he rejects. It is in this school, and during the thirty days he is in training, that the applicant proves his fitness or unfitness to be enrolled in the service.

The New York City Fire Department has a complete gymnasium, where, besides the apparatus for the development and strengthening of the muscles, are all the appliances it has in use. Thorough instruction is given to the applicant by Mr. McAdams, himself a veteran fireman, as to their purpose and proper handling. Familiarity with these appliances is absolutely indispensable to celerity on the part of a fireman, whose essential characteristic must be quickness. A slow man has no chance for appointment in the department.

Probationers are also taught morality in an indirect yet forcible manner. Remembering that their calling demands of them courage and honesty, they soon learn to despise a thief and a coward. The probationer who is with some company, either in the engine-house or at a fire, feels that he is associating with men who are gentle in their manners, respectful and obedient to superiors, ready at any instant to hold the nozzle close against a flame that menaces them with death, and who would not disgrace their uniform by stopping to pilfer in the house that they are called upon to save. If he has the true stuff in him he will soon conform with them in thought, purpose and demeanor, and on every occasion emulate them in zeal and honor.

The cultivation of good manners and other qualities that constitute a man is taught in an unobtrusive way. For instance, the applicant learns the story of the fire at Chambers street and Broadway years ago, when the employees of a bank rushed into the street, leaving $160,000 in cash on the counters. The firemen ran in, gathered the money together, threw it into the safe and locked the safe door. When the money was taken out and counted only $3 was missing, and that consisted of silver dollars, which, in the excitement, had probably rolled away. Hearing such a story, the applicant of the right material is very likely to resolve to behave with equal honesty at every fire to which he is called.

"Men are natural cowards where there's a fire," said Captain McAdams to me. "Put all Barnum's wild animals in that lot over there and then drop a child among them, and in nine cases out of ten the father of that child will go in after it. But let there be an alarm of fire in his house in the night time and that same man will run into the street and leave his child behind. I have never seen a man snuffed at a fire with a child in his arms, but I have seen women lying dead from suffocation with a child in each arm. The man's first thought is to get into the street when he hears the house is on fire. The woman's first thought is her children."

The probationers are, no doubt, naturally courageous, and each one resolves to be as heroic as any man who has won the Bennett medal, but when there is a fire and they "go in" with the firemen, their true metal is shown. The captain's eye is on them. If they waver he sees it, but if they resolutely hold their faces to the fire and obey orders, no matter if the smoke is thick enough to be cut and if their teeth are chattering loud enough to be heard above the crackling of the flames, he knows that they are of the right stuff and reports favorably upon them. If an applicant cannot stand the smoke, which Captain McAdams says, "feels in your throat as if some fellow were trying to force you to swallow a baseball," he is dropped from the list.

"After all," said the Captain, "an applicant may become skilful in tying knots, handling axes and hose, he may be a good, nifty climber, and a ready and active man all around, even able to stand heat that burns the hair off his head, but if he has not the grit to stand the smoke, he will never do for a fireman."—Epoch.

Mrs. Fourinhand—I'm so glad you're going to be one of our coaching party, Mr. Abattoir. I shall take good care to select a pretty girl for you.

Mr. Abattoir—Thanks, but I won't trouble you, Mrs. Fourinhand. You know we Chicagoans are accustomed to hustle for ourselves. Just turn me loose among 'em, and I'll guarantee I don't get left.—Puck.

"I hate square dances," said Chappie. "So do I," said his fair friend. "Give me round dances and square me—a-h, by the way, are you going to the cotillion to-night?"—Epoch.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Some Spook Stories.

On a farm near Springfield, Mo., a spectral rabbit lingers about an old well, in which the dead body of a murdered peddler was thrown many years ago. The animal is bullet proof. No matter how many shots are aimed at it, it maintains its position day after day.

A New York widower, on the night of his marriage to another woman, was surprised by a visit from the spirit of his first wife, who delivered to him a lecture on the evil of his ways, giving him to understand in the most emphatic language that she strongly disapproved of his course.

As a Maine judge was riding past a graveyard one moonlight night, he thought he saw a ghost. There was something white on top of a tomb, and it moved. Getting nearer he saw its eyes gleam. But determining to solve the phenomenon, he advanced into the graveyard, and discovered that the spectral object was only a stray sheep.

A correspondent of a Cincinnati paper says that while he was in the army in 1863, he awoke one morning on hearing his name called by his sister's voice. No one else heard the voice, and the occurrence passed from his mind. A few days later he received a letter from home, stating that his sister had died on the very day he was so strangely awakened.

The equivalent, in English money, of $2,500 was once offered by an old lady in London for the return of a favorite cat which had strayed or been stolen. People called her a "crank," and perhaps she was. It is unfortunate that one of the gentler sex should ever gain this title, yet many do. It is, however, frequently not their fault. Often functional derangements will apparently change a woman's nature. Don't blame such sufferers if they are "cranky," but tell them to use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is an infallible remedy for "female weaknesses."

"Favorite Prescription" has cured thousands of poor, bed-ridden suffering women of "female weakness," painful irregularities, ulcerations, organic displacements and kindred ailments too numerous to mention. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee that it will, in every case, give satisfaction or the price ($1.00) will be refunded.

A Curious French Case.

A rather curious affair will, it is expected, shortly be brought under the notice of the Paris law courts. A French gentleman, the owner of an estate in the department of Seine-et-Oise, has, it appears, a large number of hawthorn of very rare species, and he is justly proud of them. A short time ago a letter was brought to him, the writer of which was no less a personage than Monsieur le Maire of the locality, who, to his surprise, informed him that the said hawthorn trees were the bane of the Commune. According to the Mayor, so deleterious were the attributes of the peculiar variety of hawthorn that adorned the gentleman's grounds, that the whole country-side was, and had been for a long time past, suffering from their influence. In a word, the two years during which they had flowered had witnessed all kinds of calamities in the Commune, where neither the crops nor the health of the inhabitants had prospered. Therefore, the worthy Mayor, being for some reason fully persuaded that the hawthorn were to blame, took the advice of the local Council, the result being an ultimatum that the gentleman must forthwith destroy these disastrous trees, or, if he refused so to do, the Garde Champetre would be instructed how to proceed. It need hardly be said that the owner of the hawthorns means neither to destroy them nor allow them to be destroyed by the order of the Mayor, who is determined, if these terrible trees are not cut down, to bring the matter before the tribunals.—London Standard.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

It may be possible the correspondent of the California Associated Press misrepresented W. W. Morrow in the report of an interview claimed to have been had with him at Washington, on Friday; we hope it will develop to be a fiction of the correspondent. If, however, Mr. Morrow expressed himself as represented concerning the convention of 677 delegates that assembled in the Capitol of California last week, and characterized their proceeding in nominating him and Mr. Campbell for Congressmen-at-large, as absurd, we have been much mistaken in our judgment of the man. Until a few hours before the ballot was taken we believed Mr. Morrow would receive the nomination for Governor; that belief was entertained by the majority of the delegates from this county, and by many from other sections. His adherents stood by him to the end, and to them, at least, he should have manifested gratitude and respect. They appreciated and knew that the nomination of Colonel Markham came about honorably, and that it was the result of a manly, dignified and admirable fight by his friends. Mr. Morrow must know he was championed by some of the most prominent men in the State; that in his interest circulars were mailed throughout the State to Republican journals and prospective delegates, urging his nomination, particularly upon the ground that when in 1882 he was defeated for Congressman-at-large with the late Henry Edgerton, he received a higher vote than did his fellow Republican nominee. Considerable parade was made that at the elections of 1884, 1886 and 1888 he carried the Fourth Congressional District, which was represented to be Democratic. As written, this county favored Mr. Morrow, and the Republicans here believed that he had sufficient breadth of mind to creditably fill the executive chair. It would appear, however, he has forgotten what gratitude is, and that he has ranked himself with many of the lower grade office holders who esteem their party and their friends with cordiality so long as they remain the petted few, but manifest a petty pique the moment the tide turns. The insinuation Mr. Morrow makes that not one of this large convention knew better than to anticipate the action of Congress, and that the proceeding is absurd, is not justified by their action nor by his knowledge of their intelligence and character. The nomination of two Congressmen-at-large was considerate, and the convention fully recognized it was conditioned upon Congressional action. The report of the Committee on Organization and Order of Business, provided that after the regular nominations had been made there should be nominated "two Congressmen-at-large, if it shall be found that the population of the State, according to the new census, shall entitle the State to them; and if one only is found necessary, then the State Central Committee shall place the one on the ticket who receives the highest vote in the convention." The convention was fully aware that the tendency of late at Washington has been to restrict the number of members in the Lower House of Congress, and doubtless realized the wisdom of this policy, and felt that by decreasing the number of such as have of late been returned, more judicious selections would be made, and the mental calibre of the representatives would be raised to a standard the people would not be ashamed of. Were they lessened in numbers, it would not be as likely men would get there through their persistent and tiresome whining at the doors of political conventions, and those would be chosen who would pay more regard to the interests of their constituents and the country than to their own political advancement.

The State of California furnished the most noted instances in its early history of what can be accomplished by able and unselfish representatives at the National Capital. Without an enabling act, the people here elected on the 1st of August, 1849, members of a Constitutional Convention that assembled at Monterey, on September 1st, following. That convention framed a State Constitution that was submitted to the people for ratification on November 13th, at which election a Governor, two members of Congress, and members of the Legislature were chosen. The following month two United States Senators were elected. The Senators and Representatives proceeded to Washington, and knocking at the doors of the Houses of Congress, demanded the admission of the new State, and the acceptance of their credentials. In a lengthy memorial to Congress, dated March 12, 1850, they said among other things: "The people of California are neither rebels, usurpers, nor anarchists. They have not sought to sow the seeds of revolution, that they might reap in the harvest of discord." The application for admission brought about the most noted legislative contest that occurred on the question of slavery, in that the constitution adopted by our people declared California should be a free State, and there participated in the debates some of the greatest statesmen who have lived. Speaking of the Senate as it was then constituted, and of the consideration of the bill to admit California into the Union, Mr. Blaine in his "Twenty Years of Congress" said:

The character and eminence of the men who took part in the discussion gave it an intense, almost dramatic interest. Mr. Clay, in his seventy-third year, was again in the Senate, by the unanimous vote of the Kentucky Legislature, in the belief that his patriotic influence was needed in the impending contest. Webster and Cass, natives of the same New England State, Benton and Calhoun, natives of the Carolinas, all born the same year, now approaching three score and ten, represented in their own persons almost every phase of the impending contest. Stephen A. Douglas had entered the preceding Congress at the early age of 34, and the ardent young Irish soldier, James Shields, was now his colleague. Jefferson Davis had come from Mississippi with the brilliant record of his achievements in the Mexican war, already ambitious to succeed Mr. Calhoun as the leader of the extreme South, but was foiled in his disunion schemes by his eloquent but erratic colleague, Henry S. Foote. William H. Seward, of New York, was for the first time taking position under the National Government, at the age of 49, and Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, five years younger, was beginning his political career as a colleague of Thomas Corwin. John Bell was still honorably serving Tennessee, and John McPherson Berrien was still honoring Georgia by his service. The amiable and excellent William R. King, who had entered the Senate when Alabama was admitted in 1819, and who was Colonel Benton's senior in service by two years when he resigned in 1844 to accept the French mission, now returned, and remained until he was chosen Vice President in 1852. Hannibal Hamlin had entered the preceding year, and was still leading a bitter fight on the slavery question against a formidable element in his own party, headed at home by Nathan Clifford, and represented in the Senate by his colleague, James W. Bradbury. John P. Hale, a New Hampshire Democrat, whom Franklin Pierce had attempted to discipline because, as representative in Congress, he had opposed the annexation of Texas, had beaten Pierce before the people, defied the Democratic party, and was promoted to the Senate as an outspoken Free Soiler. Willie P. Mangum and George E. Badger, able, graceful, experienced statesmen, represented the steadfast Union sentiment of the "Old North State" Whigs, while Arthur P. Butler, impulsive and generous, learned and able, embodied all the heresies of the South Carolina nullifiers. James M. Mason, who seemed to court the hatred of the North, and Robert M. T. Hunter, who had the cordial respect of all sections, spoke for Virginia. Pierre Soule came from Louisiana, eloquent even in a language he could not pronounce, but better fitted by temperament for the turbulence of a revolutionary assembly in his native land than for the decorous conservatism of the American Senate. Sam. Houston was present from Texas, with a history full of adventure and singular fortune, while his colleague, Thomas J. Rusk, was daily increasing a reputation which had already marked him, in the judgment of Mr. Webster, as the first among the younger statesmen of the South. Dodge, of Wisconsin, and Dodge, of Iowa, father and son, represented the Democracy of the remotest outposts in the northwest, and, most striking of all, William M. Gwin and John C. Fremont, men of southern birth and proslavery training, stood at the door of the Senate with the constitution of California in their hands to demand her admission to the Union as a free State. At no time before or since, in the history of the Senate, has its membership been as illustrious, its weight of character and ability so great. The period marked the meeting and dividing line between two generations of statesmen. The eminent men who had succeeded the leaders of the revolutionary era were passing away, but the most brilliant of their number were still lingering, unabated in natural force, resplendent in personal fame. Their successors in public responsibility, if not their equals in public regard and confidence, were already upon the stage preparing for, and destined to act in the bloodiest and most memorable of our civil struggles.

The history of the memorable contest that culminated in the admission of California into the Union, is prominent in that of the country. On the 9th of September, 1850, the bill for admission was passed, and the Senators and Congressmen from the new State took their seats, despite the protest of the pro-slavery men that their elections had been irregular, and that the formation of the State government had been "a premature birth." It did not occur that the distinguished gentlemen selected by the Californians, sought out a newspaper correspondent to send back a reproach to the people who intended they should be honored; nor did it occur that of either of them there was published such as this:

But Mr. Morrow did not appear to be disgruntled or piqued in the least. He only laughed as he said: "The affair is very absurd and ridiculous. It has occasioned many a joke in the House to-day. Speaker Reed asked me when California found out she ought to have better representation in Congress. Another suggested something about 'premature birth,' while a third bawled out that I was 'a man without a country.' I consider the affair more of an affront than a compliment. I have said, time and again, that I did not desire to return to Congress; but if I did wish to return, my own district awaits me."

History does not record that Mr. Webster or Mr. Clay, or any of the other distinguished members, joked the representatives from the embryo State, or that any of them bawled out that the applicant was "a man without a country." It would seem, and of course it is true, that the Congress of to-day is insignificant when compared with that of a very few years ago, and particularly with that of the era to which Mr. Blaine refers. It is not because men of equal ability with those of 1850 are not produced in this day, but they are not sent to Washington. Were a man of the ability of Clay, Webster, or Calhoun, now elected to either branch of the Federal legislature, there might be the calamity he would die from the shock of surprise.

To follow up the precedents in our own State of what the Southern leaders in 1850 characterized as irregular elections to the Federal legislature, we come to a case that Mr. Morrow recollects in his interview. Under the census returns of 1860, California was found to be entitled to three Representatives in Congress instead of two, and the several State Central Committees agreed to place on their tickets a third candidate for Congress. On August 20, 1861, the Republican Committee nominated Frederick F. Low, afterward Governor; on the 22d the Douglas Democracy nominated Joseph R. Getchell; and, on the 27th, the Breckinridge wing of the Democratic party nominated F. Ganahl. At the election held on September 4th, the majorities were for the Republican nominees; and Mr. Low proceeded to Washington with his colleagues, and on June 3, 1862, was admitted to his seat. Later on, in 1882, in anticipation of additional representation from the census of 1880, the Republican Convention nominated for Congressmen-at-large, Wm. W. Morrow and Henry Edgerton; the Democratic Convention nominated John R. Glasseock and Chas. A. Sumner. The Democratic ticket was successful, and the two gentlemen who were sent to Congress "irregularly" were promptly seated.

While we are not enthusiastic advocates of the full text of the Federal Election Act, we must say that the conduct of the Southern people has brought upon themselves this measure. Those who seek to debauch the ballot can only be classed with the criminal element, and should be held to a strict account. It has been the cry of our Southern brothers, for over forty years, that every attempt at legislation which might affect the interest of the South was revolutionary. After the war every plan of reconstruction was bitterly opposed by the Democrats of South and North. Every amendment to the Constitution was fought on a war basis until the same are practically nullified in many of the Southern States. The fraudulent condition of the ballot in the South discloses several hundred thousand Democratic majorities where none in fact exists. Now this Federal election regulation is to adjust these frauds, and see that a fair expression of the ballot may be had. And it seems to us that any measure that is conducive of that end ought not to be considered revolutionary. But any proposition that affects the Solid South or tends to curtail the indiscriminate use of the ballot for their individual or collective purpose in solidifying the Democracy, is branded as despotic and revolutionary. Notwithstanding this state of affairs in the South, there is a disposition to accede to their oft repeated cry, "Let us alone." Many of the southern Republicans are fearful of this despotic violence, and do in fact prefer to let them alone in this ballot fraud and swindle, rather than incur the consequences of the enforcement of any National election laws. It is probable that no Federal election restrictions will be enacted, or if they are, they will be of such mild form as not to interfere with the little election pastimes of the Solid South.

We read much in magazines about the future of literature, and novels, particularly. The literature of the past was generally a pastime, and served as a vent or outlet for the energies of the authors. Of the present day it is more of a business proposition. While there is a perfect flood of books, there is, in fact, nothing entirely new. We have in our library an old volume picked up at some book sale a number of years ago, published a century and a half ago, which contains three or four short stories, and upon reading them one would suppose they were the productions of the writers of to-day. Upon comparison, a striking resemblance of the modern novelist appears. The style and matter is almost identical with the erotic novels which created such a sensation a brief time ago. If one could gather up the quaint volumes that were the fashion a couple of centuries since, they would remind us of the writings which are so popular in the literary world at this time. The great facilities for publication of modern times is about the only new thing, in fiction, particularly. In the little volume mentioned, several of the sketches are anonymous, but are choice in style and sentiment. One is from the pen of Eliza Haywood, and is strikingly similar to the works of some of our modern authoresses. On a fly-leaf we note the names of a number of Mrs. Eliza Haywood's novels; among them "Idalia, or the Unfortunate Mistress," which reminds us of Ouida's novel of the name "Idalia." A little comedy is also included, entitled "A Wife to Let," which was produced at Drury Lane theater at that time.

When we scan Gautier's introduction to his famous novel, "Mademoiselle de Maupin," written near half a century ago, wherein the press of that day comes in for some severe criticism, the applications then made answer for the present. In other words, one seems like reading a just rebuke of to-day, so apropos are his strictures on the journals which criticised his work. In this connection, Gautier says: "Hitherto, where it was wished to depreciate a work, or discredit it in the eyes of the patriarchal and ingenious subscriber, false or perfidiously isolated quotations were made; phrases were maimed and verses mutilated in such a fashion that the author, even, would have thought himself the most ridiculous person in the world; he was charged with imaginary plagiarisms; passages in his book were compared with passages in ancient and modern authors with which they had not the least connection; he was accused in kitchen style, and with many solecisms, of not knowing his own language, and of perverting the French of Racine and Voltaire; it was seriously affirmed that his work had a tendency towards anthropophagy, and that its readers would infallibly become cannibals or hydrophobes in the course of the week." How like our modern journalistic critic, when he attempts the condemnation of a book for immorality. "The book," says Gautier, "to be considered fine, and worthy of praise, is one that has not yet appeared." Continuing in his sarcasm on journalistic criticism, he says: "The book that appears is bound to be detestable. To-morrow's will be superb—but it is always to-day. Such criticism is like the barber who had the following words for a sign written in large characters: 'Shaving gratis here to-morrow.' All the poor devils who read the placard promised themselves for the morrow the unspeakable and sovereign delight of having a shave for once in their lives without loosening their purse strings, and for joy of it their beards grew half a foot on their chins in the course of the night preceding the lucky day; but when they had the napkin around their necks, the barber asked them whether they had any money, and requested them to shell out, or he would treat them after the fashion of nutters and apple gatherers in Le Perche, and he swore his most sacred oath that he would cut their throats with the razor if they did not pay. And when the poor beggars in miserable and pitiful plight, quoted the placard and the sacrosanct inscription, the barber said: 'Ho, ho! my fine fellows, you are no great scholars, and would do well to go back to school! The placard says 'to-morrow.' I am not so simple and whimsical as to shave gratis to-day; my fellow barbers would say I was ruining the trade. Come again next time, or the next week when two Sundays come together, and you will find yourselves well off.'"

The Oldest Newspaper.

The Pekin Gazette, which was established in the year 911 of the Christian era, has been regularly published since 1351, A. D., and is at the present time edited by a committee of six members of the Academy of Han Lin. Not only is it by far the oldest newspaper in the world, but it also is infinitely more instructive and interesting than all other existing gazettes taken together. To the student of Oriental statecraft in particular the yellow volumes in which these gazettes, translated into English, bound up and issued annually, should be of remarkable value.

For here, in the formal record of all the important ordinances, ceremonies, proceedings, judgments, opinions and transactions of the Chinese Government, we can see partially unfolded the working constitution of the greatest native Asiatic empire and the oldest empire in the world; we can follow the movement of the administrative wheels and obtain a glimpse of the system upon which the machinery is constructed.

It becomes thus possible to form some trustworthy conception of the principles that underlie this vast organization—unquestioned authority; lofty ostentation of public morality; the affectation of profound reverence for churches, rituals and all things pertaining to divinity; deep respect for tradition and ancestral usage coupled with steady encouragement of classic learning; entire religious toleration cojoined with the peremptory assertion of civil supremacy; provincial home rule controlled, at least in form, by a vigilant and despotic central executive; in short, the continuous experience of many ages applied to the management by a foreign dynasty of miscellaneous tribes and races and an immense mixed population.

We are shown, of course, only the external aspect of things; we probably see no more than an astute and calculating government thinks expedient to disclose. And we may assume that nowhere are the arcana imperii more strictly withheld, so that the reality may be guessed to be very different from the outward published aspect of affairs. Nevertheless, in this ample chronicle of current events and transactions, in the notifications and orders, in their style and their substance, we can recognize a leviathan Government in full play and power, dealing in a masterful and apparently successful fashion with at least one problem that has long troubled the world, and still occasionally perplexes even European statesmen.—Nineteenth Century.

The Distinctions between Man and other Animals.

If in fact the human mind had been developed through animals of the mammalian form it would be a sound inference to suppose that beings with equal mental endowments might be developed through any other form. An ant has no brain and yet is the mental equal of any other animal, man alone excepted. No particular bodily form can in reality be identified as the essential organ of mental powers, and we are at once relieved from the idea that human intelligence cannot have existed on the earth till human beings were found upon it in shapes exactly like our own.

The whole conception of animal life as existing in an ascending series from low to high is true only in a conventional sense, and with reference to our own feelings of sympathy and powers of observation. The far higher truth is that living creatures, who, as living creatures, are essentially alike, exist in every variety of form in which life can be enjoyed on earth, air, or water, and that man is not the culminating point of any series, but a being who stands alone, possessing all the living powers which all living things possess in common, but with something added by which powers and objects of another kind result in life of another order.

Mr. Wallace admits this concerning the human mind, though not concerning the human body. He is absolutely Darwinian in believing that the latter has been derived by gradual development from the lower animals. The only alternative, he argues, is the supposition that man has been produced in some quite different way from other animals, while we seek in vain in our physical structure for any indication of an independent origin. But this is surely a misconception of the case. The true alternative is a confession of ignorance; not an assertion of knowledge. We seek in vain for the "origin" of life in any form. Our utmost knowledge of the past reaches to no period when the earth was not full of it, and gives us no hint whatever of how it came there. Every type of life existing now has had an ancestry essentially like itself for an indefinite length of time, and the constant putting back of the period at which the existence of such an ancestry first becomes certain is one of the commonplaces of geological research. We have no knowledge and no real ground for any opinion as to the date of the first appearance of any of these ancestral lines, except the constantly increasing probability that it was, in every case, before the formation of any rocks now known to us. Mr. Wallace, in effect, admits this in many passages of great interest, and in the final explanation which he offers concerning the origin of the human mind he recognizes a cause sufficient to account for all phenomena not otherwise explained. He believes in the existence of a spiritual world associated with and acting on the material world, and finds in this the source of those mental characters in man himself which the Darwinian theory is unable to account for.—Albert J. Mott in the National Review.

Gethsemane.

On the very lowest slope of the Mount of Olives, deep down and unseen beyond the inclosing wall of the Temple area, lies the garden which is so associated with the sacred story—Gethsemane, the scene of the agony. Almost opposite to it, on the other side of the road which traverses the narrow valley, is what is now called the Golden Gate, supposed to have been the Beautiful Gate of the Temple. It would be the natural and nearest way by which to reach that sacred retirement. By this gate no doubt the betrayer and his stealthy band would follow the steps of the Lord to His favorite haunt, stealing down under the twilight skies to where the shade of the pale olives sheltered His prayers and mysterious anguish, and the troubled dozing of the disciples "sleeping for sorrow," confused by the strange uncomprehended tide of events, which was drawing their feet toward something they knew not what. And by this path again, no doubt, they led their prisoner back, avoiding the peopled ways, hurrying Him into the stronghold of His enemies.

It is said that there exists a Moslem tradition that by this gate the Messiah is to ride into the holy place, taking back His kingdom, and consequently the precaution has been taken—a curiously ineffectual one, considering the greatness of the event—of building up the gate. There is something even in this superstition which is grateful to the imaginative mind. And the singularly touching juxtaposition of the Temple gate and the garden is still more memorable. Gethsemane itself, a site about which there is no manner of doubt, is now a garden of flowers, protected by trim palings—a modern garden, orderly and well cared for, which gives a certain shock to the mind, but rather for the first moment than permanently.—Blackwood's Magazine.

If you wish to become acquainted with divinity do not seek it in the society of the illustrious, but in the intercourse of the good. Genius does not explain God—goodness proves Him.

It is easier to be good to everybody than to somebody.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The Seven Suabians will be the forty-third opera given an English hearing by Colonel McCaull. This is one of the greatest records, if not the greatest, ever achieved by a manager in this country or Europe. Few of the operas produced by Col. McCaull possessed so many elements of success as The Seven Suabians from a musical and dramatic standpoint.

Miss Mary Howe, the American soprano, who appeared at the Padeloup concerts in Paris, and Kroll's Garden, Berlin, will appear in the leading concerts in the principal cities of the United States, under the management of Mr. Ruben, next season. She is credited not alone with having an extraordinarily high soprano voice and perfect execution, but with being very handsome.

Fitzgerald Murphy, a young journalist, has made a dramatization of Tolstoi's novel, "Kreutzer Sonata." The work has been copyrighted. Mr. Murphy expects to produce it at one of the leading theaters during the season. This is the result of advertising the immoral character of the book by stupid officers.

There is a rumor afloat that Tamango will soon leave the stage; but there seems no reason for his doing so while his voice is yet fresh and vigorous, and as he is very fond of making money it is not probable he will throw away the ample opportunities to this end which his voice and popularity offer him.

Rubenstein, the great composer and pianist, has been leading a life of seclusion this summer at the Badweiler Baths, in Germany, busy composing. He does not expect ever to revisit America, and he intends next year to resign his position as Director of the St. Petersburg Conservatory. He was lately visited by Otto Henger.

Corelli understood how to make himself respected. While playing at the residence of Cardinal Ottoboni, his patron, at Rome, one evening, he observed that during the performance of his finest solos, the worthy Cardinal and his friends were talking together. Corelli thereupon quietly laid down his violin and joined the company. He was asked the reason of this "singular" behavior, and replied that he feared the noise of his music might interrupt the conversation.

Just Our Luck, is the title of the new play which Mrs. Doremus has written for Kate Castleton.

Book Chat.

John Greenleaf Whittier has attended the little Friends' church in Amesbury, Mass., where he lives, for a period of fifty years, but has never been known to "speak in meeting;" it is doubtful if he has ever screwed his courage up to the point of speaking in public; he always puts himself in the background on public occasions, and can never be prevailed upon to read one of his own productions before an audience.

Walter Besant, the English novelist, is the victim of a curious charge. A man accuses him of having hypnotized him and then extracted from him, word for word, the novel "The Doubts of Dives."

Margaret Sidney is a tireless writer. Her list of delightful books for the young which has just been increased by the issue of "Five Little Peppers Midway," will also be added to this year by the publication of her out-of-door family romance, "An Adirondack Cabin."

An English writer who for fifteen years or more has been a student of criminal anthropology, says that large voluminous ears are the most marked characteristic of the criminal.

The original manuscript of Capt. Cook's "Voyage Round the World," 1768 and 1771, on board his Majesty's bark Endeavor, with the Captain's autograph on the last page, was sold at the sale of the Cozens manuscripts for £31. The correspondence of Conde de Gondama, Spanish Ambassador to England, containing the secret history of the Spanish Armada, which cost Mr. Cozens £400, went for £108.

A London bookseller recently received an order from New Zealand for $4,000 worth of books for the use of the native police.

"Sergeant Tilman Joy," the hero of John Hay's poem, "Banty Tim," was Doris Bates, of Pittsfield, brother of Mrs. Nicolay. "Mage" Bates, as he was called, was a handsome, gay fellow, who danced and sang and played the guitar and broke the hearts of all the girls. He was a great hunter, a crack shot, and was known to be as brave as a lion. Probably through the influence of Nicolay, Bates was appointed by Lincoln lieutenant in the army. He was in command of a company at the battle of Pittsburg Landing, and had his right arm shot off. His body servant, a negro named Rosecrans, carried Bates off the field and saved his life. He came home at once against the surgeon's orders, who told him he would die on the trip. He brought the darkey, "Banty Tim," with him, and the faithful fellow again saved Bates' life by remaining at his side night and day pouring cold water on the lacerated stub of his arm. Pittsfield at this time was a hotbed of secession and the presence of the negro in the town was a red flag to the Democratic bulls. A "white man's committee" waited on "Mage" Bates and his father and told them to send the darkey away or he would be killed. Hay's poem is supposed to be "Mage" Bates' reply to the committee, several members of which, by the way, still live in Pittsfield. After telling the committee how the darkey had saved his life by carrying him off the field, "till safe in our lines he drapped us both, his black hide riddled with balls," he says:

"So, my gentle gazelles, there's my answer,
An' here stays Banty Tim;
He trumped death's ace that day for me
An' I'm not goin' back on him.
You kin resoloot till the cows cum home
But if any of you teches the boy,
Ee'll rassel his hash to-night in hell,
Or my name's not Tilman Joy."

It is probable that Bates did not use this language exactly, but it was to the same effect, with the result that the negro remained in Pittsfield unmolested until he returned with his master to the South. As an illustration of Bates' nerve, his brother, Dan Bates, relates the following: Two weeks after he came home, and before the sore arm had been properly dressed, Dan took Mage to St. Louis for treatment. They drove to Gilgal, a river landing, to take the boat. Mage reclined in the wagon, and by his side was a double-barreled shotgun which Dan had brought for any stray game. While waiting for the boat two ducks came whistling by and Mage seized the shotgun with his left hand, threw it to his shoulder, and killed both birds. Dan says that before the boat landed Mage had killed every rabbit and quail that came within range of the gun. Mage died in Pittsfield about eight years ago. His widow and her little daughter still reside here.

Rider Haggard, the novelist, bears a certain facial resemblance to the young Emperor of Germany; he is tall and slim and broad-shouldered, and has the bearing of a practical athlete rather than of an overworked man of letters; he has large, full, blue eyes and a light-brownish mustache, and his manner is at once frank, earnest and unaffected.

A literary expert remarks: "Novels of the day are built on spread eagle plots. They cover a wide range of sciences. The author must have a smattering of law to put his legal characters through the proper paces. He must have points on medicine to inflict the heroine with the right kind of disease. Theology must be plain as daylight to him, to set his preacher out in shape. These things make up the facts that add tone to fiction."

In 1867 a rich collector of stamps, coins, eggs, woods, etc., presented the town museum at Cassel, Germany, with one of the most remarkable set of books known to the bibliomaniac or botanist—a library of 500 volumes, each a book made of a different kind of wood. The book of each volume is formed of the bark of a tree, the sides of the wood in its mature state, the top of the wood as taken when young, and the bottom of the same wood after it has been dried and seasoned. When opened, the book is found to be without leaves, box-shaped, containing the flower, seed, fruit and leaf of the tree of which the box-book is made. Australia is said to have over 1,000 species of trees large enough to work up into books after the fashion of those in the Cassel museum. At the time of the Melbourne Colonial Exposition in 1866, a Col. Clamp exhibited a large collection of woods made into books, each alphabetically arranged, and labelled with both the common and the scientific name of the species of wood from which the dainty little wooden volumes were fashioned. The collection was gotten up to show the wonderful possibilities of Australian forestry. Taking advantage of the wooden library at Cassel, and the commendable efforts of Col. Clamp, the antipodean wood collector, Russia employed a cabinet maker during the entire winter of 1877-78 at making a library of Russian woods, which were classified and arranged for the Russian exhibit at the Paris Exposition of the year last named. As with the Cassel library, this Russian wood collection showed the wood in its several growths, as well as fruit, leaves and seeds, either natural or imitated in wax.

A will made by Frederick the Great in 1741, during the first Silesian war, was printed in the first volume of "The War of Frederick the Great," just published in Germany. It reads as follows: "I am only King so long as I am free. If they kill me I wish my body to be burnt in Roman fashion and my ashes to be inclosed in an urn at Rheinsberg. In this case Knobelsdorf (his architect) shall construct a monument for me like that of Horace at Tusculum."

Professional Chat.

There are more American physicians at the International Medical Congress at Berlin, than physicians of any other foreign nation.

Tommy—Is your little boy as big as me? Dr. Saintly, (the parish clergyman)—Why do you ask my little man? Tommy—"Cause ma said when my clothes got too shabby to wear she would send them over to your house.

Patient—Doctor, I have just sent for a demijohn of New Jersey applejack. Shall I order anything to go with it? Physician—I would recommend a coffin.

"Which is the best position in which to sleep?" asked a patient. "I usually lie down," replied the doctor.

Judge—How in the world did you contrive to carry off that heavy safe? Prisoner—It's no use telling your honor, you couldn't do it, anyhow.

Frank Carpenter, in his Washington gossip says: Speaking of great lawyers recalls a chat I had last week with Uncle Jerry Rusk about Matt Carpenter. "Matt Carpenter's widow," said the Secretary of Agriculture, "is now living in Milwaukee. Senator Carpenter left an estate of about $90,000. This was made up of his life insurance policy of $50,000, and his library, which sold for about $40,000. Senator Carpenter made an immense amount of money at the law, but he never saved a cent, and it was only due to his friends that his life insurance policy was kept up. He would have allowed it to lapse if we had not urged him again and again to attend to it, and had not seen that he did attend to it. As it was, his wife was left enough to live upon, and she has increased the amount by careful investment. "What was the secret," said I, "of Carpenter's success?" Matt Carpenter," replied General Rusk, "had wonderful ability as a speaker, and he was a greater lawyer than he was a statesman. He had that kind of a mind by which he was able to believe that every case he took up had the right on his side, and what's more than that, he could make you believe it. When he came to the Senate he had to decide for himself which side of a case was the right one, and he told me once that he did not like it and that he would prefer to have some one else make the decision for him, as he might choose the wrong side, and in that case it would be an intellectual impossibility almost for him to reverse his decision."

I once met a man, remarks Bishop Whittle, who told me he should have been an infidel but for three things: "First, I am a man. I am going somewhere. To-day I am nearer the grave than I was yesterday. I have read all the books which assail Christianity; I know all they can tell me. They shed not one solitary ray of hope or light upon the darkness. They shall not take away my guide and leave me stone blind. Second, I had a mother. I saw her go down into the dark valley where I am going. She leaned on an unseen arm, and went as calmly as I used to go to sleep on her breast. Was her faith a dream? Third, I have three motherless daughters. They have no protection but myself. I would rather kill them than leave them in this sinful world, if you blot out of it all the teachings of the Gospel."

The other evening, while some men at a New York club were trying to fight the heat by talking on whatever subject came uppermost, a discussion arose as to the sort of men most popular among women. One member of the company said that Horace Greeley was the best liked man by women he ever knew. This was rather a surprising assertion. Greeley was never neat in dress, not polished in manner, wore clothes that didn't fit, was not deferential, and was about the same in his conduct to everybody. Yet after all he was a favorite with some of the greatest women that ever lived in this town. Women like Margaret Fuller, Mary Clemmer, Grace Greenwood, Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Phoebe Carey and others that could be readily named were proud of his friendship, and the old white-coated philosopher gave them in return a friendship that was found pure and abiding.

NOTES.

The Republican party of California have the pleasure of announcing to the people that there will be a grand excursion party in November, and that the sailing will be over a Pond.

Money, matrimony and alimony form the chief business of our Courts at the present time. Looking over a San Francisco Court calendar, we found a majority of the cases were for the dissolution of the marital relation—principally women for plaintiffs.

One of the floating political fallacies that seem to take a little hold, is that a newspaper or politician can be read out of the party. While some would like to realize this fiction, it never has been done. Neither can it be accomplished. Some fondly hope to secure this result.

When we hear a fellow always posing as of the literati, and who begins a remark by the preface, "as Shakespeare said," or, "as Browning says," we brand him at once a bore. There were several just such fellows here during the State Convention, and they proved the truth of our suggestion.

The proposition that man has more brain matter than is needed, and that this fact is proven by instances where part of the cerebral tissue has been destroyed, will not find many adherents in Sacramento. There is a lack of brain matter instead of a surplus. If this is not true, then much of the alleged brain substance is cased in by walls.

The Census Office at Washington must be at once a delightful and a dangerous place for a man to enter. It is said that Census Superintendent Porter has selected a thousand pretty girls, and none but pretty girls for his office. The census office, therefore, certainly is a thing of beauty, even if the census is not likely to be a joy for a little while.

Dr. Brown-Sequard, advocates the idea that we have two brains, that what appears to be one brain acts in a dual capacity. If the learned doctor will go to San Francisco, and diagnose the crania of some of our Federal office holders—including some of the office seekers—he will discover that they have no brains—at least no political brains. In a political sense, the great scientist might visit Sacramento with a like result.

Bread from wood is the latest development of science. We have been able to extract fiery beverages and many other things from wood, but no one ever dreamed that wood could be made to produce food. What a handy thing it will be for a fellow out in the mountains to apply the process of reduction of wood to food. There will be no danger of starvation when this process has been arranged so as to be utilized. This is indeed an age of wonders. The learned scientist has not, however, given us the secret of transforming wood into bread.

For several months it has been announced that "Boss" Buckley had lost his power—was out of politics. A glance at the outcome of the San Jose Convention discloses a most remarkable vitality in the Boss. The successful aspirants had to come to him and his terms. Pond could never have reached the nomination without him. Judge Wallace fell before his power, and Stanley was nominated Chief Justice. Buckley's hand was visible in that case. Oh, yes; Buckley is out of politics—so is Huntington and the railroad. The latter, however, seems not to have the power of the "Blind White Devil." The independent character of the Republican nominees insures success. This will indeed be the "off year" for Democracy.

The ordinances of the city of Sacramento should be revised and codified. As they now stand there are few who know what our municipal laws are. Many of the ordinances could be abrogated or embodied in much smaller space. The adoption of a new charter need not have the effect to repeal our ordinances, even if we are so fortunate as to reach that Utopian period. At the present time there could be a revision of the important provisions of local government, and when a new charter is adopted, if ever, a re-adoption and republication would be all that would be necessary to give vitality to any ordinance. There is in fact only one copy of each ordinance adopted within the past six or seven years, and that is found only at the office of the Board of Trustees. It is possible there may be others who have preserved published copies, but they are few.

Tennessee has a man who certainly downs the "original package" inventor. Greenberry Williams was tried recently at Hartsville, for selling whisky without license. Williams has a farm, portions of which lie in Sumner, Macon and Trousdale counties, and his patrons are blindfolded and given the command forward march, side step to the right, then side step to the left, and then to the rear, by the right flank, etc. The customer is then asked what county he is in, and, being unable to answer, he is asked the quantity wanted and the money handed over. The customer is led back to where he began the march, and the blindfold taken off; consequently he makes a poor witness should the strong arm of the law come down on Williams. It is useless to say Williams has never been convicted of any of the charges brought, although several attempts have been made to convict him.

The Democratic Convention.

There has been held at San Jose this week, the Democratic Convention of this State. It convened on Tuesday afternoon. Ordinarily in the State Convention of a party, the questions of a newspaper of a partisan character, or the fitness or unfitness of a man to be recommended for United States Senator, are not considered. We esteem that the people of this State generally have little concern with regard to the Examiner, of San Francisco. It is known to be the plaything that an indulgent father of great means gave to his boy. Its influence has amounted to nothing outside the Democratic party, and very little within it. With the immense capital that is behind it, and that has been and is being thrown away in its sustainment, it is apparent it exercises no power in the party it has presumed to represent. It could hardly be expected the result would be different; and while Senator Hearst has demonstrated his ability to acquire large wealth, and to secure a seat in the United States Senate under circumstances somewhat different than those that attended the selections of Senators in preceding eras, it is apparent his child knows little about the conduct of a public journal. That the Call and the Chronicle eclipse it, is apparent to any one at all familiar with the business of journalism; and that it met a rebuff in the Democratic Convention is gratifying, as demonstrating that the people have confidence only in journals that are conducted legitimately. Mr. White took occasion to score the Examiner. The matter came about from a proposition that the convention should recommend who should be endorsed for United States Senator. It may not be generally known, but it is a fact, that Mr. White some months ago announced, with some considerable brassiness, that he proposed to enter the fight for United States Senator, and intimated that his extensive law practice at Los Angeles would not justify him in accepting the nomination for Governor. This matter is one of congratulation on one hand; of regret on the other—so far as he is concerned. His friends should congratulate him that he was not in the lists for Governor, as it is apparent he would not have had the slightest chance for success. There is, however, regret that the young man should be trimming his sails for the United States Senatorship, without a particle of show of reaching the port. We will not discuss the lengthy platform that was adopted by the convention, as we assume the people fully understand documents as liberal as the one under consideration, are but as molasses to catch flies. It will happen, however, that by November the fly time will have passed in this warm climate.

Mayor Pond, of San Francisco, was nominated for Governor on the fourth ballot after an exciting contest. We will concede Mr. Pond to be the strongest nominee who could have been selected from the field presented, and realize that his nomination will be parallel with that of Governor Bartlett, who had also been the executive head of the great city by the sea. There are differences, however, between the men. Governor Bartlett was a man of very broad views, and his abilities as a statesman were recognized within and without his party. While it will be conceded that Mr. Pond has made remarkable runs in San Francisco, it must be remembered that there is much about him that savours of the demagogue. A proper regard by an official of the interests of the people is commendable, and an exhibition of independence from corrupting influences brings reward justly to an officer. There is, however, such a thing as one leaning too far back, and we believe Mr. Pond will find before the campaign is over, he has made a mistake in trying to be too good at the expense of the deserving. Justice to the people and with those that deal with them is right to all parties concerned. To swerve to the one side or the other means either incapacity or sycophancy.

For Lieutenant-Governor, Senator R. F. Del Valle, of Los Angeles, was nominated. His father represented Los Angeles county in the third session of the Assembly, and the son was Assemblyman the twenty-third and twenty-fourth sessions, and was State Senator the twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh sessions. In 1884 he was nominated for Congress on the Democratic ticket, and was defeated by Colonel Markham, the present Republican nominee for Governor. For Congressman from the Second District, Senator Caminetti, of Amador, has been named, and from the Third District, Colonel John P. Irish, the editor of the Alta California. While there may be a slight hope in the Second District in that Major Biggs carried it two years ago by a majority of 497, we are disposed to think that Senator Caminetti will not be as fortunate as was the Major, and it should not be forgotten that Judge Blanchard, the Republican nominee, is a gentleman of great popularity. Colonel Irish, in the Third District, of course has an easy time of it. All he will have to do will be to hang the political crape on his door at the earliest possible moment. McKenna's majority the last time was 4,275, and particularly what is the matter with that we would like to know?

The New Era in Journalism.

There was recently established in the East, a school for the education of young men in journalism. Such men as Greeley, Weed, Raymond, Brownlaw, and many in this State, who had made their journals and themselves prominent, have passed away, and it was felt there was need the successors of these great men should be properly educated, that the people, who are assumed to know nothing, should have the advantage of the thoughts of brighter minds. The graduates from this school of journalism have found ready employment, and we assume one of them has been employed by the Bee of this city, and that his first effort was the following principal editorial that appeared in the issue that journal of extended circulation, on Wednesday last:

"A verbatim report," said Arthur McEwen the other day, "is the last refuge of stupidity." And that witty, keen journalist is correct. No man who has any pride in his profession, any confidence in his ability, any ambition to make his paper bright, any desire that the public shall read and be interested in his work, will ever permit one of these intellectual anesthetics to chloroform the pages of his journal. A verbatim report is the life-buoy of incapacity and journalistic helplessness. It saves those only who should be permitted to drown. It betrays no intellectuality on the part of its author, any more than the phonograph emits brainy gray matter. It reads badly; it waddles through stick after stick of slush, like a lame duck in a mudhole. A good reporter at a political convention, a board of trade meeting, any assemblage of many citizens on a topic of public importance, will catch all the salient points as they fly. He will photograph them vividly before the mental eye of the reader, each with its due prominence, so that one rapid glance will tell exactly what was done and said, and the purpose thereof. Your verbatim reporter, on the contrary, lacking the intellectual perception to distinguish between that which is essential and that which is merely adjunctory, gives the reader everything; and the result is that his work is a big mass of indistinguishable rot, for which he should be exiled, and the journal publishing put under bonds to keep the intellectual peace."

Journals of the old style, such as is THEMIS, whose editors assume to address a people as intelligent as themselves, and a class better able to form conclusions than the average newspaper reporter of to-day, take little stock in the arrogant assumption that the brains of the country are entirely with the reporters and editors. Yet lest there be alarm, we will assure the excitable young editor we will not chloroform the pages of our paper; we will not permit any one to drown if we can help it; we will not introduce in our office a phonograph that will emit brainy grey matter or any other character of matter that will soil our carpet. About the episode of the lame duck in a mudhole, we would certainly reprove the duck for its indiscretion, but while we have not had the journalistic education the young editor of our contemporary has, we do not believe any duck of ordinary intelligence, that had a game leg, would, after having been lamed, try to wade in a mudhole when it could as well travel on dry land. This intimation the young man makes of catching salient points as they fly, doubtless comes from the fact that his principal education in the college of journalism, was in writing up accounts of frightful runaways or the flight of other wild geese. We are, however, encouraged from this specimen editorial, that the live journal is keeping apace with the times, and expect that from the subsequent editorials the young man will write our people will have abundant food for thought. We desired, of course, to meet this able journalist of the new school; his name, however, was not upon the register of the new hotel recently erected here by our contemporary, when we called. Therefore it must be we, with the balance of the people, await an introduction.

The Sunday Husband.

"The most delightful person at a summer resort is the woman with a Sunday husband," says one who knows. "She is always to be found in one of the quieter resorts near the large cities; she is always pretty, usually young, and the most devoted wife in the world—on Sundays. During the week, while her husband is down in the city, she is the leader in all the gaieties that are going on. She plays tennis with the college boys like the best of them, she flirts with the elderly men, who quite understand her, and she turns the heads of all the young men who don't understand her. All this during week days. But on Saturday night everything is changed. When at dusk the big stages come rumbling up to the little hostelry, with their long seats filled with tired, dusty-looking men, she stands, the best-dressed, the most eager-eyed, affectionate little woman in all the assembled crowd of guests, and when Tom comes stepping up to the piazza she gives one wild little cry, settles on his coat collar as if she had done nothing all the week but mourn for his absence. And Tom pats her fluffy head and feels sure that he has the dearest little wife in all the world, and they walk off, she clinging fondly to his arm quite like a pair of lovers, while all the men who have been her slaves all the week look foolish and would like to punch Tom's empty head. But they don't know, poor souls—and neither does Tom—that the whole thing was got up for their benefit. For a woman always likes to show a man the endearments that may be in store for some man, even though she has no wish or purpose that they should be for him."

The editor sat on a hard-bottom chair trying to think of a thought; and he plunged all his fingers about through his hair, but not one topic they brought. He had written on temperance, tariff, and trade, and the prospects of making a crop; and joked about ice-cream and weak lemonade till his readers had told him to stop. And weary of thinking, sleep came to his eyes, and he pillowed his head on the desk; when the thoughts when the thought which awake had refused to arise, came in troops that were strong and grotesque. And as the ideas airily float, he selects the bright one of the tribe; and this is the gem while dreaming he wrote: "Now is the time to subscribe."—Mattoon Star.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The red stage curtain of the Metropolitan has received a much needed cleaning and repairing, which greatly improves the interior appearance of that handsome theater. If now, the owner could be induced to remove that "misfit" which does service as a drop curtain, she would receive the grateful thanks of the theater goers of this city. We have several times called attention to the inappropriateness of the design on the drop curtain. We trust its probation has reached its limit.

The Palmer Company was with us for a brief season this week. It is one of the strange events, that such a splendid combination fails to attract paying houses. The new Metropolitan was opened by this grand company, and at that time Fate seemed against these artists, as the management lost heavily on the engagement. Now they come here and again the public fails to respond. The Madison Square Company, as at present organized, is one of the greatest theatrical combinations in the world, and yet it fails to "draw" in this city. It is certainly not on account of the lack of appreciative audiences. The only reason that can be assigned, is the prejudice against extra prices—this must be the secret of the lack of patronage. We are sorry, and presume the Palmer management will never venture an engagement in Sacramento again. However, the bills presented here were not by any means as strong as the repertoire contains. Captain Swift, while artistic, is gloomy. Aunt Jack has little merit other than to disclose some fine character acting. A Man of the World, was really a little gem which pleased all. Jim the Penman was given at the matinee, which was a mistake, as this is one of the company's strong plays.

The Circus.

We will all be boys to-night. Old John Robinson's great circus and menagerie have pitched tents and will show this afternoon and to-night. It is useless for old men and women to try to resist the allurements of the circus. Youth will crop out, and the bygone days revive upon the periodical visits of the circus. The present combination is considered one of the greatest known. At 1 o'clock there will be a performance, and again at 8 in the evening. A grand street parade will occur at 10 o'clock in the morning. There will be few who will fail to witness John Robinson's great show.

The Gas Well.

The gas well at Fifth and R street gives evidence very encouraging to the gentlemen who engaged in the enterprise, and gratifying to the citizens generally. It is now 385 feet in depth, and a heavy flow of excellent artesian water has been produced. Many citizens visited the well and drank of the water that was discharged from the pipe several feet above the surface. The evidence of gas was very perceptible. The work of sinking the well will be prosecuted and we feel confident from the indications shown the results will be satisfactory.

Old Horse Sale.

On Saturday next at 10 o'clock A. M., at the salesrooms of W. H. Sherburn, No. 323 K street, a public auction of unclaimed baggage remaining at the Western Hotel will be held. By attending the sale and buying some of the numerous grips, valises, etc., you may have a chance to pat yourself on the back for your shrewd business sagacity, or kicking yourself for your hard luck.

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 94° and 51°, with gentle to fresh southerly winds and a cloudless sky. The highest and lowest temperature during the same time last year was 98° and 57°, and clear weather prevailing.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos. *

It is generally understood that hair and nails grow faster in hot weather than in cold; but, perhaps, few are aware that any temperature can impart so great a stimulus to the growth as Colonel Pjevasky, the Russian traveler, says the Central Asia heat did during his journey in those regions in the summer of 1889. In June the ground and the air became excessively hot; so great, indeed, as to render travel in the daytime impossible. Within a fortnight after this oppressive weather began, it was noticed that the hair and beard of all the party were growing with astonishing rapidity; and, strangest of all, some youthful cossacks, whose faces were perfectly smooth, developed respectable beards within the short period of twenty days.

FLASHES.

Hair-Weighing Scales.

The New Orleans Mint authorities are humping themselves that they have got a set of balances finer than anything in the world. With them the exact weight of a hair can be ascertained, and the difference in the weight of a card after a name has been written on it is denoted.

This is nothing extraordinary, and all Mints have assay balances, which are made sensitive to the lightest weight. The beautiful and delicate instrument at the Philadelphia Mint will weigh as low as the 1200th part of a grain. The needle indicator is so sensitive that the air even affects it, and the balance is inclosed in a glass case. A speck of dust will cause a commotion in the machinery, and the organization is so fine that a hair on one side or the other would upset all calculations.

The delicacy of the machine can be estimated when it is understood that the 1200th part of a grain means the 576,000th part of an ounce, or the 6,912,000th part of a pound. These beautiful balances are used for determining the exact proportion of gold or silver in any given quantity. Nearly every mint in the world has them in use. They are very costly, and have to be adjusted every time anything is weighed upon them.

A Boy on Tobacco.

Tobacco grows something like cabbage, but I never saw none cooked. I have heard men say that cigars that was given them election days for nothing was mostly cabbage leaves. Tobacco stores are mostly kept by wooden Indians, who stand at the door and fool little boys by offering them a bunch of cigars which is glued into the Injun's hands, and is made of wood, also. I tried to smoke a cigar once, and I felt like Epsom salts. Tobacco was invented by a man named Walter Raleigh. When the people first saw him smoking, they thought he was a steamboat, and were frightened. My sister Nancy is a girl. I don't know whether she likes tobacco or not. There is a young man named Leroy who comes to see her. I guess she likes Leroy. He was standing on the steps one night, and he had a cigar in his month, and said he didn't know as she would like it; and she said; "Leroy, the perfume is agreeable." But when my big brother, Tom, lighted his pipe, Nancy said: "Get out of the house, you horrid creature, the smell of tobacco makes me sick." Snuff is Injun meal made out of tobacco. I took a little snuff once and then I sneezed.—N. Y. World.

Are There Unlucky Houses?

When Secretary Blaine opened his new residence at Washington on January 8th attention was called to the fact that the house, an ancient mansion newly reconstructed, had always proved unlucky to its occupants, and due predictions were made accordingly. The very worst of these predictions have been fulfilled. Within a week Mr. Blaine's eldest son sickened and died, and death has since carried away his daughter, leaving broken hearts behind. Forty years ago the house was the home of Secretary Spencer, and from its threshold his son, a midshipman in the navy, went forth to be tried for treason, and hanged from the yardarm of the vessel in which he served. Through its door, Philip Barton Key passed out to meet death at the hands of Daniel E. Sickles. Later, an assassin crept into its corridors, and plunged a dagger into the throat of Secretary Seward. These may be mere coincidences, but they are sufficient to make half the world believe that an evil fate overhangs this old Washington mansion.

Taste is not equally distributed over the whole surface of the tongue. There are three distinct regions or tracts, each of which has to perform its own special office or function. The tip of the tongue is concerned mainly with pungent and acid tastes; the middle portion is sensitive chiefly to sweets or biters, while the back or lower portion confines itself entirely to the flavors of rich, fatty substances. This subdivision of faculties in the tongue makes each piece of food undergo three separate examinations, which must be successively passed before it is admitted into full participation in the human economy.

Under the queer heading, "Labor Notes," the Rochester Post-Express publishes these interesting statistics: "Gold's income is $4,446 a day; Vanderbilt's, $15,249; Rockefeller's, $18,715, and William W. Astor's, $23,591, including Sunday." The "Labor" part of it probably refers to the hard work required to count so much money every day.

A new disease has appeared in the governments of Vilna, and of Rovna, in Russia, and spreads so rapidly there are five or more persons suffering with it in every village of the entire region. The symptoms are quite similar to those of cholera, vomiting, headache, and the obstruction of the nasal canal. The persons afflicted with this disease suffer for three days. The physicians are not able to define it.

The wealth of the United States is unofficially estimated at $71,500,000,000, an increase in ten years of 42 per cent. England's wealth was placed at $50,000,000,000 in 1885, but divided among a smaller population than that of the United States; while the value of France's property is put at $36,000,000,000. Taxes in England average $20 per capita, and in the United States $12.50.

Uncle Sidney's Views.

I hold that the true age of wisdom is when We are boys and girls, and not women and men;— When, as credulous children, we know things because We believe them—however averse to the laws. It is faith, then, not science and reason. I say, That is genuine wisdom—and would that to-day, We, as then, were as wise, and ineffably blest, As to live, love and die, and trust God for the rest!

So I simply deny the old notion, you know, That the wiser we get the older we grow, For in youth, all we know we are certain of; Now The greater our knowledge the more we allow For skeptical margin; and hence I regret That the world isn't flat, and the sun doesn't set, And we may not go creeping up home, when we die, Through the moon, like a round, yellow hole in the sky.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

Onion, Coffee, Watermelon and Bread-and-Butter Habits.

"I was for many years a victim of the onion habit," he said. "Onions to a man who likes them are irresistibly fascinating. It was always a temptation to me to eat them at every opportunity. When I was forced to go out that day, and so was obliged to deny myself the onions, my sacrifice caused me actual misery. One of my tricks was to eat a late supper after working hard until long past midnight. (O! this supper sliced onions with a salad dressing formed no unimportant part. I discovered that the more onions I ate the less I was able to resist the cajoleries of their flavor, and, determining to free myself from this servitude, I deliberately set down one night to cure my unsavory passion. I sliced the biggest and strongest ones that could find, made my own dressing and then set to work to eat them. I ate until my throat was on fire and my stomach was a furnace. I ate until tears poured from my eyes. The biggest and strongest one of all I saved for the last and as I devoured that I wept bitterly. But I was without pity toward myself and remorselessly and fiercely ate on. I have not eaten an onion since that night. I do not like them."

While on the subject of the onion habit the writer ventures to mention another no less terrible in its chains of slavery. A bachelor, who works late at night and so does not arise at an early hour, has for years had his coffee in bed immediately upon awakening. He declares that if he is forced to dress without having had his coffee he is unable to eat breakfast. He suffers from a severe headache all day and goes to bed miserable. He admits that he has not the courage to try to break himself of the habit. Wives and mothers doubtless feel no sympathy for this slave.

Another case was that of a man who was passionately fond of watermelons. Coming from San Francisco to New York once, he acquired a violent "watermelon thirst." The ride across the hot and dry plains of Nevada had left his throat with a wild craving for watermelon. At North Platte, Neb., he was able to buy a sickly green watermelon for $1.25. He returned to his sleeping car armed with his melon and six bottles of beer. He ate the melon down to the rind, drank the beer that afternoon and spent the night on an exploring trip similar to one of Dante's. That watermelon, he says, was his last. He could forgive the beer, but the melon—never!

And now men in three instances have shown themselves poor, weak creatures, the tools of the whims and fancies of a depraved taste, it is only fair to speak of the case of a woman who is the wife of one of the best-known men in New England. Before going to bed at night she always eats a thin slice of bread and butter. She avers that without it she could not sleep. She never eats more than one slice, but that one slice is actually necessary for a peaceful slumber. She is a striking example of a victim of the bread-and-butter habit. Bacchus might well smile at the mention of intemperance.—New York Tribune.

"Wrong to be ambitious, forsooth! The men wrong, who, with bent back and sweating brow, cut the smooth road over which Humanity marches forward from generation to generation! Men wrong for using the talents that their Master has intrusted to them—for toiling while others play!

"Contented, unambitious people are all very well in their way. They form a neat, useful background for great portraits to be painted against; and they make a respectable, if not particularly intelligent audience for the active spirits of the age to play before. I have not a word to say against contented people so long as they keep quiet. But do not, for goodness' sake, let them go strutting about, as they are so fond of doing, crying out that they are the true models for the whole species. Why, they are the dead-heads, the drones in the great hive, the street crowds that lounge about, gaping at those who are working.

The People of the State of California, To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk, By W. W. RHODES, Deputy Clerk.

T. H. WALLIS, Att'y for Petitioner. gt—jz.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of Wm. B. Miller, an insolvent debtor.

Wm. B. Miller having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said Wm. B. Miller is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation, or association for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 15th day of August, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, July 9, 1890.

JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge of the Superior Court.

W. A. GETT, JR., Attorney for Petitioner.

The Etiquette of Salutes.

The Secretary of War has promulgated a new set of rules governing the firing of salutes. Hitherto a national salute consisted of one gun for each State in the Union, but the stars on the national ensign are growing so numerous that it has been thought best to curtail the number of guns. Hereafter the national salute will consist of twenty-one guns. On the fourth of July and certain other occasions, what is to be called a salute to the Union will be fired, consisting of one gun for each State. Years ago a national salute consisted of thirteen guns, in honor of the thirteen original States, but the regulation was afterward changed to make it one for each member of the sisterhood of States. Very rarely hereafter will be fired what is known as the salute to the Union, consisting of one gun for each of the States. On the fourth of July of each year it will be in order, but rarely at any other time. The order of salutes will be hereafter, for a Brigadier-General eleven guns, for a Major-General thirteen guns, for a Lieutenant-General fifteen guns, for the General commanding the army seventeen guns, for the Secretary of War nineteen guns, for the President of the United States and the national salute twenty-one guns, and for the salute to the Union one gun for each State.

Even soap is a horror, and the pain resulting from a dash of suds needs only to be felt to be feared.

"O, ah, let me see, what do you give for a cold on the chest?" asked Jones, in a sort of indifferent tone, of a doctor with whom he was slightly acquainted, as he met him on the street. "Advice," was the laconic reply. So do we. We advise you not to neglect that hacking cough and drowsy feeling, the coated tongue, the failing appetite, the indigestion and general lassitude and debility—that "stirred feeling" as so many express it. Take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, in time, and it will not disappoint. It is not only the most wonderful alterative, or blood-cleanser, known to medical science, but also possesses superior nutritive and tonic or strength-giving properties. For Bronchial, Throat and Lung Diseases, accompanied with lingering coughs, the "Golden Medical Discovery" is absolutely unequalled as a remedy.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Short Breath, Consumptive Night-sweats, and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines. It's the only lung remedy, sold by druggists, guaranteed to benefit or cure, in every case, or money refunded.

He Knew What He Was About.

A man entered a photographer's establishment a few days ago, and said:

"I want a cabinet picture of myself."
The artist placed him in position, and screwed up his machine to the proper focus. "Now, look bright and cheerful," he said, "and keep your eyes fastened on that hole in the wall."

But instead of looking bright and cheerful the man concaved himself forward, dropped his jaw, and assumed a look of infinite weariness.

"What's the matter with you?" exclaimed the photographer. "Brace up, I say, and look pleasant."

"If this position costs anything extra," was the answer, "I am willing to pay for it. My wife is in the country visiting friends, and this picture goes to her. I know what I am about. Pull the blanket off, Mr. Artist, and begin counting."

I went out in the air to listen,

To hear if ever a sound would fall,
The faintest sound of those old loved voices,
Hushed and lost in the silence all.

There, as old, the willows whisper
Of deep green mysteries to the stream;
There, as of old, the smile of summer
Folds the fields in a hazy dream.

But long and late as I listened, longing,
There fell no tone through the empty air
Of those loved voices that made youth's music,
Only a stillness everywhere.

JOHN F. COOPER

SOLE MANUFACTURERS' AGENT.

631 J STREET, Sacramento, Cal.

From Sig. Martinez, Concert Solo Pianist.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style of solid iron frame Mathushek company Pianos. (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

We are not disposed to characterize Mr. Pond as "the most contemptible hypocrite that has ever aspired to honorable office," nor to denounce him as a political scoundrel, in that we hope he will be defeated and care not to assist in his election. We realize that abuse of candidates by their political opponents is more likely to aid than injure them, and there was much of truth in what we said that the coarse abuse of Colonel Markham by a portion of the press, aided much to bring about his nomination. Years ago campaigns were conducted upon the principle that nominees should expect their lives would be scrutinized from the moment they saw the light of day, and that their own sins and those of their ancestors would be brought in review. That time has, however, passed, and the managers of political journals and parties have come to realize that the people take little stock in empty vituperation. We have not the slightest doubt, however, that Mr. Pond has befriended Buckley for years, and that there has been much of the demagogue in his assumed friendship for the people and unselfish regard for their interests. We have seen enough of public life to "view with alarm" a candidate or an officer who desires the people to understand that he is particularly good, and would sooner select one who claims not to be a saint, and who will not, when in office, play to the gallery, and from the moment of his installment, lay his wires for political promotion. Mr. Pond, we do not know personally, but we do know that in the session of the Legislature of 1885, in which we sat, Mr. Buckley assured us he would not permit the passage of a certain bill that was meritorious; that after its passage through the Houses Buckley laughingly assured us that we had two more rivers to cross; that the ablest Judges in the State asked Governor Stoneman to sign it; that Mr. Pond, then a Supervisor, came to Sacramento to influence the Governor to kill it; that after its approval Buckley again told us it would never stand; that the matter of its constitutionality was considered by the Supreme Court, and a favorable decision had in department, but on rehearing the law was declared unconstitutional. Shortly after that time a matter of contempt came up in the Supreme Court, in which Buckley was respondent. It was charged that for some $500 he had agreed to procure a favorable decision by the same Supreme Court for a San Francisco litigant in a civil suit. The facts we have so briefly outlined are within our knowledge and that of others who sat in that Legislature, and concerning them we will speak more in detail hereafter. Mr. Pond, of course, has a perfect right to befriend Buckley and to accept his friendship. He is justified in concealing his relations with Buckley from the people. Buckley will readily agree to that policy, for everyone understands that men of his calling in politics are indifferent to criticism, and must have a few at their command who will lend a show of respectability to their movements. Mr. Pond and his adherents understand that this paper will fight him until the last, but we will not pursue a course of attack that will gain for us the disrespect of our readers. The gentlemen who have been and will be nominated against the Republican candidates expect a manly and dignified fight to be made against them; so far as we are concerned they will not be disappointed; but unless we will be in a position to prove, we will not denounce any one of them as a scoundrel or a hypocrite.

Selfishness may be born blind, but it has a wonderful keenness. There is a wealth of selfishness and uncharitableness in our present system of politics. It is almost impossible to eradicate the greed of some men, not only in political matters, but all other affairs of life. When we find selfishness and vanity combined and placed in a position to force or purchase a recognition from controlling elements in politics, then there is danger to good government. There is, of course, a degree of self interest with us all, but not that abominable element which possesses some, who would sacrifice friends and everything for the accomplishment of their ends. Political leaders should be free from this element, and careful to circumvent those who are thus selfish, from gaining power or preferment. The late Democratic State Convention was at the absolute mercy of selfish and unscrupulous men. No matter that men of good moral character were the choice of that body for most of the positions, still vile power brought about the result. The independent character of the Republican Convention curtailed the power of the "selfish," and brought forth uniformly excellent results. True the pernicious practice of trading was indulged in to a large extent, but fortunately good men were successful. This trading business in conventions is a dangerous practice, and often defeats the will of the people, and foists upon them very incompetent and dangerous men for political power. Enlightened selfishness, is often the worst. The rich and intellectual selfish and conceited man is one to be avoided, but the rich, ignorant, selfish creature, is the one to be feared and suppressed. We have had some practical experience with the latter class of late years in political affairs. In minor matters we have some of the most intolerably selfish men in our own locality. They are grabbing and clutching at every office that comes in sight. No election escapes them. They knock at the door of every political convention or place for the distribution of patronage that is presented. Holding office as most of them have for years, they are still insatiable. When their claims—if claims they can be called—are ignored, they are the loudest in the denunciation of their party. This applies to both political parties.

The most useful things are generally ugly. The greatest statesmen, poets, philosophers, authors, and men-at-arms, were ill-favored as far as comeliness was concerned. While the trite saying: "A thing of beauty is a joy forever," seems popular, it is in fact one of the popular fallacies. Beautiful things are in the main useless. An exception might be made to this rule with regard to the stage. There beauty in women, and handsome form and face in men, is part of their capital stock. It is rare indeed that beauty forms a part of the composition of our great men. Jove gave beauty in men, at the expense of brains. Nature may be lavish in her gifts, but in this one respect the Olympian god placed a limit. A beautiful horse may be a good racer, but for usefulness he does not count. In other words, the world could easily exist without such beautiful creatures. Flowers are beautiful; but again we could live without them—millions do. With all our philosophy on this subject, and all the hard, cold facts thereon, there are very few but what prefer the beautiful. Ugly merit, greatness and usefulness, with the great majority, must give place to the beautiful on earth. Beautiful women, pictures, flowers, will always be admired, when the ugly statesman or philosopher will be unobserved. Put it as you will, this is human nature. A beautiful woman can conquer more men than the greatest general, or the most powerful statesman. We yield more to the beautiful on earth, than to the useful. Perhaps this is only true in the intellectual portion of the world. Most men would, like Sardanapalus, rather give a prize for the invention of some new pleasure, rather than a reward for a virtue.

In taking the census of the United States, the departments at Washington exacted from the Supervisors and enumerators, haste and promptness. Every detail of red-tape requirement had to be complied with to the letter. The work was limited as to time in which it was required to be completed. The duties imposed upon supervisors and enumerators were performed to the exacting demands of the Census Department. All the enumeration was completed about July 15th, except a few special districts, and the returns from these were forwarded to Washington about August 1st. Many districts were finished before the first of July. Now, while the heads of departments at Washington were in extreme haste to have the census enumeration completed, it seems that there is no desire or attempt to pay for the work with any degree of promptness. We read in the Eastern papers that the Superintendent and department clerks had a grand banquet on August 15th to celebrate the consummation of the census work at Washington, and that thereupon the overworked Superintendent and others departed for an outing to some summer resort. There is but little thought of the poor devils of enumerators who did the hard work for a miserable allowance, which in many instances scarcely covered their outlay. Not a man has received a dollar, although the work has been finished in most cases over two months. The Supervisors who have been on duty ever since the 1st of March, and at considerable expense, not to mention the devotion of valuable time, have also been ignored and allowed to wait for their compensation. It is certain that none of the heads of departments or clerks at Washington have to wait a day after the services are performed before they receive their pay. The volume of business is no excuse for keeping poor men out of their earnings. A great and rich Government should not only grant adequate and just compensation, but it should provide for a prompt payment when services are performed. There is entirely too much red tape in our Federal departments.

There are perhaps some stupid blunders in the departments at Washington, which have created delay, by imaginary defaults in not making proper returns by enumerators or supervisors. We have an illustration of this neglect of detail at the Census Department in Washington, by an unpardonable blunder of some one there with regard to this census district. More than a month after the Supervisor's final report, which shows the full population and all other census requirements for every enumeration district, the Superintendent telegraphs that one district has not been reported. This shows that those having charge of the details at Washington were extremely negligent, as the very matter mentioned in the telegram had been repeatedly discussed by Supervisor and Superintendent sometime before the commencement of enumeration, and orders came from the census department abolishing the very district which it was claimed had not been reported. Under their noses was the consolidated enumeration of that particular district. Yet with this fact before them, they would indite a long telegram asking for a report, and no doubt they have delayed the business of the department on account of their own stupid blunder. While there was the most scrupulous exactness demanded of the enumerators and supervisors, it was not uncommon to remind the heads of departments at Washington of a number of their own serious mistakes which occurred in this district alone. We mention these matters because the department has shown no disposition to promptness in paying the compensation of the men who have faithfully done their work.

Just how far it would be wise for government to go in extending relief in cases of destitution and suffering of a people of a particular section of the country, brought about by crop failure, pestilence or other causes beyond human foresight and control, is difficult to determine. The policy of the Federal government has been to divert no public money for charitable purposes; and while the government is not paternal, no restriction is placed on States or lesser governing authorities doing as they please in matters of this character. We are inclined to think the Federal policy is correct, though it seems harsh in some instances. However, these things regulate themselves, and they have been largely taken in hand by the people voluntarily. If it were that appeals to Congress for aid would be considered, there would be danger of great abuse. Even as these matters of extensive charity are now conducted, much that is contributed to relieve want and suffering is misdirected. In a country so large as this, it will of course frequently happen that the calamities of fire, flood or pestilence will demand that aid should be extended to the sufferers, and we can well pride ourselves that it has been tendered with more than a liberal hand. There should, however, be a national organization to collect and disburse charity funds, and the management should be left with it entirely. Judgment should be passed upon the merits and necessities of the cases, and an amount should be appropriated sufficient to meet the present embarrassment. In case, for instance, of a large fire, or a flood, it should not be expected provision should be made further than to tide over the first shock of the calamity, and the losers should not expect their losses will be fully compensated. We recognize, of course, the distinction between a calamity affecting an individual or a few, and one comprehending the population of an entire city, or section. In the one case required assistance will come from neighbors conversant with the circumstances, in the other the appeal must be made to those remote from the scene. Yet it is, in the minor case, the benefactors are in a position to intelligently view the surroundings, while in the other, those living in remote localities have to depend largely on hearsay, and to draw conclusions in some instances from exaggerated accounts. There is no question but that this matter of the dispensation of popular charity is much abused by the sensational press, for when a calamity happens it is painted in its most dismal colors, and journals, to advertise themselves, will take advantage of it by making their offices collection bureaus. The rule of unostentatious aiding is disregarded, and parade is made that such and such a journal has raised so much money—therefore purchase a copy for five cents. In this city great good is done by the Howard Benevolent Society; those interested in it proceed without bluster, and the same course should be pursued in the more extensive field.

The failure of the Democratic State Convention to declare Judge Armstrong, of this county, its nominee for Supreme Justice, was regarded here with surprise and regret, both by Republicans and Democrats. Judge Armstrong has served for six years on the Superior Court bench. First appointed by Governor Stoneman to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Clark; next appointed by Governor Bartlett to fill the vacancy occasioned by the elevation of Judge McFarland to the Supreme bench; and two years ago, in this strong Republican county, Judge Armstrong was elected by the people by a flattering majority. In this county partisan politics enters very little in the selection of judges; the people choose men with respect only to their fitness, and had the Democratic Convention exhibited wisdom, Judge Armstrong would have been placed upon the ticket. His strength for Supreme Justice lays in the fact that he would have had a large Republican following throughout the State, and that he would have well held his own among the members of his party. Against his integrity as a man, nothing could be urged; his course upon the bench here won for him an election that demonstrated the estimate entertained of him by the citizens of the opposite party.

Ex-Congressman Horace F. Page died at San Francisco, Saturday. He was born in Orleans county, New York, October 20, 1833, and came to California in 1854. For a time he operated a sawmill near Colfax, and afterward located at Placerville, and engaged in the business of staging. His first venture in politics was as a candidate for State Senator, in 1869, but he was defeated. In 1872 he was nominated for Congressman, against the late Paschal Coggins, and after an animated canvass, wherein the candidates held joint discussions, was elected on November 5th. He was reelected September 1, 1875, November 7, 1876, September 3, 1879, and November 2, 1880; but at the election held November 7, 1882, was defeated by James H. Budd. Mr. Page had not the advantage of a finished education, but was possessed of much good sense and judgment. He soon familiarized himself with the situation at Washington, and during his long term accomplished much for good for his constituents. He served longer in the House of Representatives than any other man from this State—five terms. Of the others, Charles L. Scott served two terms, Aaron A. Sargent 3, William Highby 3, James A. Johnson 2, S. B. Axtell 2, J. K. Luttrell 3, S. O. Houghton 2, Romualdo Pacheco 2, C. P. Berry 2, W. S. Rosecrans 2, Barclay Henley 2, Jos. McKenna 3, W. W. Morrow 3, Chas. N. Felton 2, Wm. Vandever 2, Marion Biggs, 2.

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government was Established from Chaos.

PART XV.

Early in September, 1849, a temple of Thespes was erected on Front street, in the city, called Hubbard's Theater. It was of very primitive structure, made largely of canvas, and the first entertainment public given there was by a company of Ethiopian minstrels.

By that date the commerce of Sacramento had become very considerable. Some notion of its extent may be obtained by considering a list of the vessels at our levee September 1st: Barques: Joven Guipuzcoana, Harriet Newel, Whiton, Eliza, Elvira, Wm. Joy, Isabel, Croton. Brigs: John Enders, Salillo, Jackin, Viola, Stirling, North Bern, Charlotte, Emily, Bourne, Almena, Cordelia, Geo. Emory. Schooners: Odd Fellow, Lola, Gazelle, Gen. Lane, Pomona, Anther, Catherine. At Sutterville: Barque Josephine and brig Orbit. Without statutes or ordinances to guide the Harbor Master (R. J. Watson) or the masters of these vessels, much confusion existed on our levee. The master of every vessel wanted a favorable locality to discharge cargo. Generally these vessels were not consigned to merchants here, the goods were in charge of a supercargo, or master, and were for sale. Purchasers were merchants here or at the mines, and great numbers of miners came directly here to lay in supplies. To exhibit their wares, the owners used the levee largely at their pleasure, and necessarily came in competition for space, and sometimes in collision.

The City Council determined to remedy a growing evil by clearing the levee of obstructions. This was done partly from a necessity for more room for new cargoes, and under a pressure from our merchants, who had to pay rent whilst the masters of vessels occupied the levee free. The Harbor Master, aided by the Sheriff, commenced the labor of clearing the levee on the 4th of September, and they found less opposition than was expected. The necessity of such action was apparent even to the ship-owners, and they mainly acquiesced. The Harbor Master and Sheriff gave ample time, and the goods were gradually placed on storage, sold, or returned to the vessels, and the levee left under control of the Harbor Master.

At this time, September 4th, Capt. John Van Pelt, started steam navigation between San Francisco and this city. His engine was 16-horse power; capacity of boat, 100 passengers; speed, 7 knots per hour. About this time, also, Kimball & Co. established an express business between Sacramento and San Francisco.

The City Council did not hold a meeting again until the 15th day of October. In the meantime the members and their friends were not idle. They determined again to submit the defeated charter to a vote of the people. They called a public meeting at the St. Louis

Exchange for the 3d of October, to discuss again the merits and demerits of that charter, and the necessity of some such organic law. They took care that the officers of the meeting should be friends of the movement. Its various provisions were discussed, some amendments were adopted, and the charter as a whole was adopted by the meeting, and it was resolved that 300 copies of the charter be printed and circulated, and that an election be held at St. Louis Exchange, on Second street, between I and J streets, on the afternoon of Saturday, October 13, to vote on the proposition whether the charter should be adopted, and the Board of Election was directed to exclude from voting all non-residents. The election was held pursuant to notice, and it was conducted with much animation. Some of the tactics resorted to later in a Democratic primary may be referred to that election for a precedent, and when the votes were counted and the result announced, the following was the result: For amended charter, 809; against amended charter, 513; majority for, 296. And so the people, voting at a single polling place, on a call by a public meeting, gave such form and consistency to our city government as they might, and the City Council thereafter and until a charter was granted by the Legislature, acted under its provisions. A separate provision, submitted to a vote at the same election, was whether the City Council should, by ordinance, provide for a system of licensing the several classes of business done here at the time, and that question was determined in the affirmative by a vote of 203 to 28.

The City Council now resumed their regular sessions. The people had ratified their acts and had given them a renewed lease of power, with larger scope to their action.

That body again met at the office of Burnett & Rogers, bankers, on the north side of J, between Fourth and Fifth streets, on the evening of Monday, the 15th of October, 1849. Present: A. M. Winn, President; Councilmen Rogers, Jennings, Chapman and Cornwall; Rogers acting as Secretary pro tem.

The President reported the adoption by the people, at an election held October 13, of the amended city charter, by a majority of 296 votes, and that the City Council had been authorized by a vote to issue licenses to men desiring to do business in the city.

The Council also recited that Wm. Stout was absent from the city, and for a long time had failed to attend to his duties as Councilman, and his seat was declared vacant. The Council also resolved that all previous acts of the Council, whether by ordinance or otherwise, not repugnant to the charter just adopted, be declared in full force and effect, and that Messrs. Rogers and Chapman be a committee to report on sundry bills presented for payment.

The City Council again met Oct. 16, and on motion of Councilman P. B. Cornwall, Dr. T. J. White was unanimously elected a member of the City Council to fill the vacancy caused by the removal of Mr. Stout, at the former meeting. This power was assumed, not given by the charter, and the Council seemed to be on a pretty safe footing, in fact self-perpetuating. The Council again met the next evening (Oct. 17), and Dr. White, having been notified of his election, appeared and took his oath of office, administered to him by James S. Thomas, First Magistrate. Dr. White thereupon returned thanks to the Council for his election, in a style "chaste, classical and eloquent." The Committee on Accounts was granted further time to report. Dr. White was then placed on the Committee on Wharves and Streets. A petition was received from J. B. Starr, praying for an ordinance regulating, licensing and taxing auctioneers, which was received and referred to the Committee on Finance. A notice was also received by the Council, presented by Mr. Lundy, informing them that he would contest the legality of the election by the people, establishing a city charter, which notice was laid on the table. So it appears that the City Council, with the authority it asserted, was not to exercise its functions unchallenged.

On the 25th of October, a public meeting was held at the St. Louis Exchange, to make nominations for the next Legislature, but no action was taken. But on the 29th a larger and more enthusiastic meeting was held for the same purpose, in the open air, in front of the City Hotel on Front street, between I and J, S. C. Hastings then a prominent lawyer, and afterwards politician, Attorney-General and Justice of the Supreme Court, presiding. It is quite evident that there were more aspirants than places to fill, and that the nominations would be sharply contested. The meeting adopted tactics since and still much followed in ward caucuses. On motion a committee of nine was appointed to report the names of suitable men to become members of the Legislature. This committee having been appointed with instructions to report to an adjourned meeting, a number of orators, afterwards well known in the business and politics of the State, addressed the meeting: Jno. McDougal, G. B. Tingley, E. J. C. Kewen, Edward Gilbert, J. F. Morse, J. R. Snyder. Mr. McDougal was afterwards Governor.

Tingley had a standing as a prominent politician for fifteen or more years. Gilbert killed in a duel, Morse, a prominent physician in Sacramento, and one of the fathers of Odd Fellowship in the State, he owned and established the drug store since maintained at the northeast corner of K and Second streets. J. R. Snyder held a prominent place in the public eye till a few years ago; he died owner of a large vineyard in Sonoma county.

The meeting met pursuant to the adjournment the next evening (October 30th), but the committee did not attend. Public opinion was not controlled by the meeting, and they did not name their selections for some reasons not explained. But the names were given to the public as follows: For Senators, John Bidwell, Elisha O. Crosby, Henry E. Robinson, Thomas J. Green. For the Assembly, Thomas J. White, John F. Williams, R. Gale, Elisha W. McKinstry, P. B. Cornwall, Geo. B. Tingley, John Bigler, J. P. Long and John P. Hughes. This ticket not suiting all the persons present at the adjourned meeting, a meeting was then and there organized with John S. Fowler, President; H. C. Cardwell, Vice President; C. Lindley, Secretary. This meeting also appointed a committee to report nominations. This committee reported, and each name was taken up separately and the merits of the man discussed, some names were adopted, others rejected and others substituted, and when completed the ticket stood: Senators, John Bidwell, H. E. Robinson, Harden Biglow (afterward Mayor, and killed Aug. 14, 1850), and E. O. Crosby. Assembly, H. C. Cardwell, P. B. Cornwall, John S. Fowler, H. L. Ford, Madison Walthal, W. B. Dickerson, James Queen, F. Ames and K. Berry.

A. M. Winn announced himself as a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor. C. E. Picket announced his candidacy for the Senate, and E. J. C. Kewen announced that he would be a candidate for Congress.

On October 27th the steamer McKim first arrived at our levee to take her place on the river between San Francisco and this city. She was a propeller, 200-horse power; Captain Macy; R. Gelston & Co., agents.

On September 13th, Captain Wm. H. Warner, the engineer who planned Sacramento was killed by Indians on the Lassen route. On November 7th the steamer Senator arrived here and took her place on the river, plying between this city and San Francisco.

On November 10th, the first criminal trial in Sacramento city since Picket was acquitted at the Fort, occurred before W. E. Shannon, Judge of the Court of First Instance. Samuel Norris was complainant. The defendant was charged with stealing a heifer valued at $40. Verdict, guilty. Fine, $200 and costs. Costs $315; and defendant was to stand committed until the fine was paid.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

M. Got, the comedian of the Comedie Francaise, was asked whether a comedian requires intellect in order to succeed. He is said to have remarked that no intellectual faculty whatever is needed to insure histrionic success. Actors without intellect—and heaven knows there are plenty of them—rush forward without fear, full of self reliance, while if they were intellectual they would be continually afraid that their interpretation of such and such a character was wrong, and, fearful of having made a mistake, would lose their confidence. M. Got might, with entire truth, have gone much further and said that the same state of affairs obtains in all professions.

The troubles of Henry E. Dixey, the actor, are coming in groups. His little wife is suing him for a divorce, and his summer season in Chicago has ended in disaster. His new play of Kip was a failure. When Dixey left Rice and started on the raging dramatic sea in his own boat, it was very generally expected that he would fetch up on a rock. He is a bright comedian, but he needs a strong hand. He is generous to a fault, and worst of all he hasn't a particle of business sense or training. He knows nothing of the value of money and his gaming instinct is deep-seated. Besides he has a fondness for pretty girls, and the temptations of a burlesque company are numerous and constant.

"Look here, Davis," exclaimed the manager of the dime museum, aghast, "you have made a mistake. It wasn't an Esquimaux girl I wanted for this department. It was a Circassian girl." "That's all right, Colonel," replied the traveling agent. "Ulga," he said, turning to the dusky beauty, "go wash your face and friz your hair."

Play writer—"Just think what a misfortune I have had! A rat has eaten my manuscript of Pepin the Great through and through." "Well, now you can say truly that there is at least some one in the world that has a taste for your writing."

In the time of Shakespeare domestic service was in a state of transition; the old system was decaying, the new one springing into life; and if anyone may be allowed to judge from casual references scattered throughout the plays of the poet, the new order does not appear to have been altogether successful, says a writer in Chambers' Journal. In King Lear, to take one example—Kent denounces Oswald, the steward, as a "knave, a rascal, and eater of broken meats; a base, proud, shallow, beggarly, three-suited, hundred-pound, worsted-stocking knave!" From Shakespeare's plays it further appears that the servants of the period were companions and confidants of their master and that they were generally sly and pilfering and players of practical jokes. In great families it was customary for servants to take an oath of fidelity on their entrance into office. Posthumus alludes to the usage when he says of Imogene's servants:

Her attendants are
All sworn and honorable.

The condition of servants at this period was therefore peculiar, and it is clear that they were ruled by a curious mixture of stern discipline and great laxity. One mode of enforcing obedience was by imposing forfeits or fines, some of which are enumerated by Sir J. Harrington in his Nugæ Antiquæ. For being absent from prayers, for uttering an oath, for leaving a door open, or "for any follower visiting the cook," a fine was inflicted; while in another set of rules it is provided that

If anyone this rule doth break,
And cut more bread than he can
Shall to the box one penny pay.

In case an offender should refuse to pay "direct without resistance," provision is made at the conclusion that

Each one here shall be assistance,
And he that doth refuse to aid
By him one penny shall be paid.

It is said that James Brown Potter has secured a divorce from the lady who gave up society to elevate the stage.

The well-known composer, Gustavus H. Kline, has written an original song for Patti Rosa, which she will introduce into The Imp. It is entitled "The Funny Little Fellow with the High, High Hat." It is expected to make a greater success than her famous song of "Caroline."

The historic Drury Lane Theater in London is to be pulled down at the expiration of its present lease in 1894. This is the only London theater besides the Covent Garden which is not bound by the decision of the Lord Chamberlain, as its patent dates back to the time of Charles II.

It is probable that the coming year there will be a revival of the legitimate English opera. With strong companies this would be a popular move. The extremely light opera has, like the farce comedy, about run its course.

Book Chat.

"Why is it, Mr. Cynique, that poets always write about the 'dull red gold?' Gold is yellow, not red." "It's the result of their fervid imagination, Miss Besie. Poets never see the color of gold, you know; they only hear about it."

Moncure D. Conway, who is at work on a life of Hawthorne, says that Hawthorne originally heard the story of Evangeline related by an Arcadian exile and intended to weave it into a romance. But he incautiously told the substance of it to one Connolly, who imparted it to Longfellow, with the intimation that the material had come from Hawthorne as a gift.

Algernon Charles Swinburne has effectually disposed of himself as Lord Tennyson's successor by the ode in which he recommends that the Duke of Edinburgh's brother-in-law be sent "howling down his father's way." There is now no poet in sight for the Laureateship with a purely international reputation except Oscar Wilde, and he will be ruled out if the Queen ever catches a glimpse of "The Picture of Dorian Gray."

It was on an Illinois river packet that John Hay found his "Jim Bludsoe," the engineer whose only religion was to mind the pilot's bells, and who swore that if the Prairie Bell ever took fire he would "hold her nozzle agin the bank till the last galoot's ashore." The poem relates how the boat took fire, how the passengers had faith in Jim's "cussedness" and knew he would keep his word, and how, while holding "her nozzle agin the bank," Jim's ghost went up "in the smoke of the Prairie Bell." It so happened, however, that the hero of the poem is still living. His name is Wash McCann, and his home is at Milton, in Pike county. He is still minding the pilot's bells on an Illinois river boat, and it is said of old Wash that if the time ever comes he will hold his boat "agin the bank till the last galoot's ashore."

Judge Hughes, the author of "Tom Brown's School-days," was delivering a lecture the other evening on "American Humor" at a Cheshire (England) village, and delighting his audience immensely. He was so wrapped up in his subject that he was totally oblivious as to the time, and before he had completed the first part he was reminded by the church clock that his train was due in a few minutes. He accordingly picked up his manuscript, umbrella and coat, and left the room, while the audience cheered and took it as a mere joke. They expected him to return, but he did not, and the audience dispersed rather ill-humorously. This is characteristic of Judge Hughes.

When Daudet in his youth was engaged to become the secretary of the Duke de Moiry, he was surprised at being received at his first interview with his employer with a marked degree of coldness and an abrupt intimation that he might retire. The Duke afterwards confessed laughingly that on beholding the soft-eyed, blooming, long-haired youth, he fancied that some one was playing a trick upon him and had substituted a pretty girl to represent his new secretary. But the passage of years as well as Daudet's intense sufferings from rheumatism have deprived him of the delicate bloom and feminine charm of his early years.

Professional Chat.

The nomination of Hon. John B. Reddick, by the Republican State Convention, for Lieutenant-Governor of California, brings to mind a little episode which occurred ten or a dozen years ago. John Reddick, as he was familiarly called, was quite prominent as a criminal lawyer, and scarcely an important case arose in Calaveras county that he was not on one side or the other. In that locality there were very many stage robberies, and Reddick was retained by most of the captured highwaymen in their defense. In a majority of cases he managed to secure an acquittal of the accused. It often happened that men who would be least suspected of crime, would be apprehended and charged by Wells-Fargo's detectives with "stage robbery." Frequently, too, the testimony would be presented so strong that all Reddick's resources failed, and convictions and confessions would follow. One day Reddick concluded to take a little vacation at the capital and bay cities for a few weeks, provided himself with sufficient funds for his trip, and boarded the stage at San Andreas. There were a number of passengers, each having quite a sum of money. In addition, Wells-Fargo's box, had a large amount of bullion, which fact was evidently known to some of the enterprising gentry who levy contributions from that source. At a lonely point on the route an order of "halt!" was given, when driver and passengers looked down the muzzle of a couple of shotguns. Wells-Fargo's box was demanded, and thrown out. Then the passengers were ordered to alight and yield up their surplus cash. The robbers were masked. Reddick was the last to get out of the stage, and remarked: "It is damned tough to spoil my vacation." At the remark, one of the robbers looked up, saying: "Hello, John, we'll let you keep your money, on account of retainer in case we are caught." After the passengers were relieved of their coin, they were allowed to reënter the stage and proceed on their way, congratulating Reddick on his luck. Sometime after, a couple of fellows were captured, charged with this robbery. Sure enough, Reddick was their counsel, and by clever management cleared them before a jury. Reddick would never tell whether his "retainer," allowed on the occasion mentioned, was a part of his actual fee for defending the accused.

"But, Doctor, you said last week that the patient would certainly die, and now he is perfectly well." "Madame, the confirmation of my prognosis is only a question of time."

"I know why it's so hot in summer," said Willie. "Why?" "Because the ministers all go to Europe, and the devil just turns the heat on."

In 1882, David R. Paige, Democrat, says the New York Star, ran for Congress against Capt. A. S. McClure, Republican, in a Republican district in Ohio, which included the "iron wards" of the city of Cleveland. A trusted lieutenant of Mr. Paige, the second night before the election, found a man who, in height, form, features, and voice, strongly resembled Captain McClure. He dressed this man to personate the Captain, and took him into the iron wards, where many of the men were frequenters of saloons. A man known among the iron-workers was hired to introduce this counterfeit in the saloons as Captain McClure. At each place visited, the simulator, after being introduced as Captain McClure, asked, in spread-eagle style, the voters present to vote for him, made some fulsome promises, walked up to the bar and called for two glasses of beer, which he and the master of ceremonies drank. Not a voter present was treated to a drop. The howls of derision and indignation which went up from each saloon after the departure of the pretender, and his guide can be imagined. The next night David R. Paige covered the same ground, and, not to go too much into detail, the contrast was so great that Captain McClure lost enough votes in Cleveland to defeat him by a very slim majority.

"Give me a dollar's worth of stamps, please," said a lady to the clerk of a postoffice. "What denomination, Madame?" "Presbyterian, I suppose. That's what Mr. Wanamaker is, I believe."

NOTES.

Mr. Justice Field has been kind enough to add Waile to the Republican State ticket, and the party has a Hart. Our Democratic friends started at a Pond, stopped for Coffey before they had Dunn, and wound up with a Yell.

The Sacramento delegates to the San Jose Convention, proved themselves the most influential delegation in that body, having secured two members to serve on the State Central Committee. Their modesty met with its reward.

James A. Seadler, a prominent architect of this city, has been appointed Superintendent of the work of constructing the new Federal building. Mr. Seadler is a very competent man, and gives general satisfaction to the public. Under his management the new structure will be promptly commenced and pushed to a rapid completion.

The New York World is highly complimentary to California fruit. It pronounces it the only fruit worthy of the name, now to be found in the market. The shippers who use the refrigerated cars can land their cargoes in the Eastern cities in splendid condition. As a matter of fact the great bulk of our finest fruit is now sent to the Atlantic market.

Sacramento is commencing to assume the appearance of a city. Some of the residence streets have been and are being graded and graveled; block after block of stone sidewalks have been laid, and it would now seem we will soon be able to boast of a modern electrical railroad. The indications from the gas well are encouraging. Let the good work go on.

A country editor grasped the tail end of the garment of the immortal muse, and burst forth in the following "git thar all the same" poetry: Oh! the clothes press is a swell affair, for garments nice and neat; the hay press is a grand machine, and does its work complete; the cider press is lovely, with its juices red and sweet; but the printing press controls the world, and gets there with both feet.

It is apparent that the Board of Registration of San Francisco, with Pond at the head, is under the absolute dominion of Buckley and his "rock-rollers" and "heelers." Each meeting discloses the baleful influence of these outlaws, who would debauch the ballot if allowed full swing. Indeed, it seems that the influence and power of this element is dominant, even with such "pure men" as Mayor Pond.

Political glory is short lived; so we imagine the delegates from this county to the Democratic State Convention must feel. After the trouble of holding primaries, of wrestling before a local convention, of paying their fares to and from San Jose, of enriching the hotel men of the Garden City, they return to their constituents, having toiled hard yet accomplished nothing. It is a case of too many irons in the fire, and of a divided house. Better luck next time.

Every age of the world has been pronounced an immoral one. No matter what epoch in history we may turn to, there is the same old cry, that the period is immoral. Our reformers, each succeeding year, proclaim the immoral character of everything—drama, literature, politics, individuals. While there are some pretty tough people in nearly all departments of life, there is nothing to show that we are any worse than preceding generations. There are more people on the earth, but the proportion of evil is not greater than before.

It was a law of the ancient Greeks that compelled the Judges to hear the arguments of lawyers in some dark places, lest their good looks and graceful gestures, attitudes and manners should influence them favorably and incline the scales of justice. There is no necessity for any such stringent regulation in these days. It is rare indeed that our modern lawyers possess any of these attributes—good looks, graceful gestures or otherwise, which might influence judges. At times, however, there are other potent influences which are said to sway the scales.

We anticipate Mr. Boruck's "hoss" paper will for the next few months furnish interesting reading on matters of agriculture, the raising of fine stock, etc. The Republican Convention overlooked an important matter. There should have been a vote of thanks tendered Mr. Boruck that he brought out all the possible campaign thunder against Col. Markham in advance of the campaign, and that whatever will be said against him hereafter will be ancient history. Boruck has demonstrated that unreasonable abuse is the most potential instrument to employ to favor the one it is designed to crush, and doubtless has spent some little time in thought since the events of this month.

Brother Will Green, of the Colusa Sun, printed at the head of his columns last week, and over his account of the proceedings of the Democratic State Convention, a picture of an apparently well-fed and aristocratic rooster, reared, doubtless, in Colusa county, holding an elaborate wind instrument, and evidently in the act of crowing into the small end of it. We assume the bird the Sun pictures is of last spring hatching, and does not appreciate that when he will be a few months older, if he should crow into the bugle it will not give forth an uncertain sound, and that he will realize he will be at the smaller end of the concern. He will certainly understand that a Pond is better adapted for ducks than for roosters.

The Democrats in this county seem at a loss what to do. A county convention has been held, but after selecting delegates to the State Convention at San Jose, an adjournment was taken and the consideration of the matter of nominating a county ticket, it was understood, would be taken up hereafter. The party is badly demoralized, particularly so after the fruitless labor of the delegation at San Jose, and it seems there will be difficulty to induce enough suitable candidates to present themselves to form a local ticket. It does not interest the Republicans further than the disappointment of having no one to fight. After having perfected preparations for an active and effective campaign, it seems somewhat rough there will be no foe to encounter.

Those who have lived neighbors to the fellow who was learning to play on the fiddle, and have broken the commandments in consequence thereof, will have additional cause for deep-rooted revenge on a new inventor, who has brought forth an instrument which is played in the same way as a piano, but the keys do not strike on the ordinary strings; they act upon a mechanism which produces the sounds from six violins, two violas and two violoncellos concealed in the body of the instrument. Just imagine a noise practicing on one of these things, ye who have borne the torture of one fiddle! A seminary girl practicing on the piano could not hold a candle for such torture. This invention is another of those terrible German productions, not to mention the "little German band" and "German beer."

The "monarch of the dailies" continues its Cheap John system, and in contemplation of the forthcoming celebration at San Francisco of the anniversary of the admission of the State into the Union, opens its ballot box—the worn-out journalistic fake—and proposes to receive ballots as to who is the most popular Native Son. Quietly its solicitor has been canvassing here among the members of the order, that their pictures and sketches will be printed in the "monarch" at the rate of fifteen dollars a head. We will be curious to see how many of our young men will avail themselves of this economical and speedy method to gain ephemeral glory. However, as the fact remains that a $1,500 badge is to be given, we vote solidly for Colonel Fred. Crocker, who most generously put up just ten times that sum for the purchase of the Sutter fort property, and donated it to the Order. There is certainly no one more deserving.

Some months ago THEMIS, by a well written article from the pen of one who is familiar with the facts and who has a thorough knowledge of the scenes of action, advocated the possibility of a scheme to build a railway to extend to St. Charles bay, from which point rapid transit by steamer could be made to England, and which would reduce the time to less than one-half. What we presented in theory and as a possibility, has developed into an immediate probability. By a late telegram from Quebec it is authoritatively announced that a company, composed of English and French capitalists, has been formed to accomplish the building of a railway eastward from Quebec 850 miles, to the Labrador coast, from which point large steamers can make the trip to Milford Haven, in Wales, in 3½ days. On this route, if accomplished, fruit and perishable freight can be carried from Chicago to London in seven days. Thus what we presented as a possibility, is about to be realized as a certainty. It will not be long before we may be able to circumvent the earth in thirty days.

There are two orders of nobility in this State. One the Grand Army of the Republic, the other the Old Pioneers of California. No matter how great, powerful or rich one may become, he cannot gain entrance to either of these orders, unless he wore the blue in the time that tried men's souls, and in the other unless he crossed the border of the Golden State in '49. The rapidly depleting ranks of both admonishes all that the time is near when the last member will be summoned from earth. We give an extract from the New England Magazine relating to the Grand Army, which is a picture in itself: "No child can be born into it; no proclamation of President, edict or King, or ukase of Czar can command admission; no university or institution of learning can issue a diploma authorizing its holder to entrance; no Act of Congress or Parliament secures recognition; the wealth of a Vanderbilt cannot purchase the position; its doors swing open only upon presentation of the bit of paper, torn, worn, begrimed it may be, which certifies to an honorable discharge from the armies or navies of the nation during the war against rebellion." And unlike any other association, no "new blood" can come in; there are no growing ranks from which recruits can be drawn into the Grand Army of the Republic. With the consummation of peace through victory, its rolls were closed forever. Its lines are steadily and swiftly growing thinner, and the ceaseless tramp of its columns is with ever lessening tread; the gaps in the picket line grow wider; day by day details are made from the reserve, summoned into the shadowy regions to return to touch elbow no more; until by-and-by only a solitary sentinel shall stand guard, waiting till the bugle call from beyond shall muster out the last comrade of the Grand Army of the Republic. This may be applied with equal force and eloquence to the California Pioneers.

From Bunko to Drama.

There is a jolly manager of one of the local San Francisco theaters who never was a saint, but who, a number of years ago, was less of a saint than now. He was not then in the theatrical business; yet at times his calling was something of a dramatic nature, that is to say, a fraud. It was at the early period of the introduction of the famous "bunko" outfits, and the "gold brick swindles." As we said, our "manager" was "one of the boys," and anything was fish that fell to their nets. To be an expert "bunko steerer," or "manager," or gold brick swindler, required sharp wit, and considerable courage. Of this element our hero possessed a goodly share, although what we propose to tell on him shows that even the sharpest are often themselves the victims—to use phrases common to the class, the keenest workers are often "suckers." The scene was laid in New York city. The "sucker" was selected in the person of a cunning old Hebrew, who was known to deal in contraband goods and articles of a shady history. A long story was told him about a stage robbery in California, and the capture of a valuable gold brick, which it was proposed to sell to him at a great discount. The brick was produced, and a corner chipped off for a test (the corner had been "salted" for the occasion). The assay was all right, and three thousand dollars was planked down to "our hero," to be taken to headquarters for a "divy." It seems that in this case there was no honor among thieves, for two of the "gang" who wanted larger returns than their "divy" would warrant, were watching near the place where the money was paid, and disguised his officers. As soon as "our hero" came out, they pounced upon him and arrested him. In addition to the three thousand dollars, "our hero" had several thousand dollars' worth of diamonds on his person, obtained in about the same manner as the gold-brick money. The pretended officers led him to a secluded spot and searched him, taking money and diamonds. After this they started for the jail. On the way one of the "officers" got thirsty, and went into a saloon, as he said for a drink. The saloon had a convenient back entrance. After a little wait the other "officer" remarked that his partner was taking a long drink, and told the prisoner to stand outside while he went in after the other officer. "Our hero" thought this a good opportunity to "jump," but after running a block his wits came to him, and he realized that he had been the "sucker." When he presented himself at "bunko" headquarters, his pals who were waiting, came near mobbing him for his stupidity. He never got back his diamonds or the money. On another occasion "our hero" was on the lookout for an "injun," and finally spied a fellow who had come to New York from the interior to purchase goods, having for that purpose four or five thousand dollars. With the art known to "bunko steers," he won the favor of the stranger by disclosing a large roll of bank bills, saying that he was on the same mission from another part of the country. As in all such cases, they both found their way to the "bunko" headquarters, where it did not take long to secure the wealth of both parties. The "sucker," of course, thought his companion was a victim as well as himself. They left the place together, bewailing their misfortune. It was, of course, the duty of the "steerer" to get rid of the "sucker." So they walked along together, cursing their fate, and each expressed himself as ruined. The "steerer," "our hero," was loudest in his woe. Finally they reached a lonely spot, when "our hero" exclaimed that he never could face his partner in the country, and said he had resolved to kill himself. He took a small pistol from his pocket, pretended to place it on his temple, and fired, at the same time falling as if dead. The "sucker" seeing this, forgot about his loss; and not wishing to be found in the presence of the suicide, took to his heels and ran for dear life, boarded the first train and left the city. Of course, this was the result intended; whereupon "our hero" returned to headquarters and obtained his "divy" of the five thousand dollars fleeced from the stranger.

Our theatrical manager is not in that line of business now, unless you can call the present system of managers a blood relation to "bunko." We do not give "our hero's" name, but there are many of his old-time friends who will recognize the picture at a glance.

The following advertisement is copied from an old number of the New York Gazette and General Advertiser. It is in quaint old type:

JOHN JACOB ASTOR,

FOR SALE	100 qr. enfs fine gun powder,
200 fwords,—200 pistols,
2 pr. 4 pound cannon complete,
500 mock Morocco skins,
1 ton copper bolts,
Hatters wool and furs of all kinds,

Also—To Let on lease, several Building Lots, upper part of Broadway. April 20.

Evidently it was quite a promiscuous lot of wares that the founder of the Astor family dealt in. The fact is worthy of note that even at the time mentioned he was willing to rent and lease his real estate, but not to sell it.

The Astors have a peculiar manner of their own by which all the male members of the family can be recognized. They have all prominent brows and an absorbed, thoughtful look that is far from genial. John Jacob Astor's ponderous solemnity conveyed an entirely wrong estimate of his character. People who had never seen him smile were always a little afraid of him. William Waldorf, from constant association with his father, grew to have his manner. With his solemn mein no one would recognize the politician and diplomat who represented his country in Italy.

FLASHES.

It is not a crime to tell the truth, but at times it is a very great inconvenience.

Did any one ever know a selfish woman to have any friends. The same can be said of the forked-tongued scandal monger.

Mosquitoes drink more blood than lions. This fact discloses that we must beware of little things, as well as the more formidable.

Some of our local politicians think themselves intellectual Samsons. Their greatest weapon, however, is the same as that used by Samson—the jaw-bone of an ass.

Registration.

As well as has been possible, public notice has been given to the voters of the county that they must re-register or lose their franchise in the coming State and county election. The Republican County Central Committee have from the first desired a full and complete registration, and to that end have not nor will they spare expense. They have employed two clerks—John J. Cahill and George Miller, whose former connection with the census and postoffice gave them a wide knowledge of the whereabouts of residents, and they duplicate the 64 precinct registers for the committee as they are being prepared in the Clerk's office, that opportunity for revision will be afforded. Those not registered can be ascertained, and if any there be of the "hobo" element, investigation can be made in sufficient time that no advantage can be taken.

The State Fair.

The outlook for the 37th Annual Fair of the State Agricultural Society, that will open here on September 8th, is excellent, and doubtless will be the most noteworthy exposition held in the State. New and important features will be added. We cannot in our limited space detail them. The races, judging from the entries made, will be of unusual interest. The management has been assiduous in its work, and that work is telling.

The Weather.

The highest and lowest Signal Service temperature during the past week was 96° and 55°, with gentle southerly winds and generally clear weather prevailing. There was a very light sprinkle of rain yesterday, being the second time this month that a sprinkle has been precipitated. The highest and lowest temperature during the same time last year was 94° and 52°.

Swimming Baths.

It is gratifying to note the success of the enterprise to establish swimming baths in this city. There is nothing more needed, and after once started will prove popular. Nearly all the stock has been taken, and early next year the swimming baths will be completed.

Several interesting discoveries have recently been made in the United Kingdom. Near the ancient monastery of Llanelltyd, in North Wales, laborers have unearthed two beautifully chased gold dishes, the one a wafer-dish and the other a cup, both weighing forty ounces. London experts agree that these vessels were made for and used at the celebration of the sacrament many hundred years ago, and were doubtless buried by the monks during the reign of Henry VIII. When found the metal was incrustated by nearly two inches of vegetable matter. As the relics were discovered upon crown lands they will be handed over to the keeping of the royal family.

Sam Jones is now directing his evangelizing efforts against the settled complacent wickedness of the old quiet town of Mexico, Missouri. He told a deacon of that place the other day, that in his degenerate days, "he had blown in more money on a single drunk" than the said deacon had contributed to religious purposes during all the years of his self-righteous, self-satisfied life. The deacon was startled a little, but not to the extent of "shelling out" an unaccustomed amount of coin.

THE BEAR FLAG.

The First Published Account of the Bear Flag of 1846—A Matter of Interest to the Native Sons of the Golden West.

The following was printed in the Californian of February 13, 1847, the first newspaper that was published in California. The paper was established in Monterey, and the first number was issued in August, of 1846, by Colton & Semple. Robert Semple, one of its editors and proprietors, actively participated in the Bear Flag Revolution, and was therefore familiar with the events that occurred in that memorable period of our State history. Two months after the raising of the Bear Flag, at Sonoma, he wrote a resume of revolution, and on the date stated above reprinted the following in his paper:

THE BEAR FLAG.

Our readers will remember that we promised to make our paper a history of the country, a promise which we shall try to redeem.

At this time it is a matter of great doubt in the United States where the first flag of the American Revolution was hoisted, and what kind of thing it was, evidently from the fact that no person thought it a matter of sufficient importance to make a record of it in such way as to transmit the facts to posterity.

Our object in penning this article is to make permanent record of all the particulars of the hoisting of the "Bear Flag," under the impression, that, as that was the first move in revolutionizing this country, it will some time be interesting to know where, when, by whom, and what kind of flag it was.

On the 14th June, 1846, a party of Americans, without a leader, gathered and took possession of the fortified town of Sonoma, on the north side of the bay of San Francisco, and made prisoners of three Mexican officers, a General, a Lieutenant-Colonel and Captain. On the same day there was a partial organization under the name of the "Republic of California," and agreed to hoist a flag made of a piece of white cotton cloth with one red stripe on the bottom, and on the white a grizzly bear, with a single star in front of him; it was painted, or rather stained with lamp black and pokeberries. Along the top was the words, "Republic of California."

In 1874 there was published an article in the Sonoma Democrat, purporting to give "A True History of the Bear Flag." In that article the writer said:

Among the Bear Flag party were three young men, Alexander Todd, Benjamin Duell, and Thomas Cowey. A few days after the capture, in a casual conversation between these young men, the matter of a flag came up. They had no authority to raise the American flag, and they determined to make one. Their general idea was to imitate, without following too closely, their national ensign. Mrs. W. B. Elliott had been brought to the town of Sonoma by her husband from his ranch on Mark West creek for safety. The old Elliott cabin may be seen to this day on Mark West creek about a mile above the springs. From Mrs. Elliott, Ben. Duell got a piece of new red flannel, some white domestic, needles and thread. A piece of blue drilling was obtained elsewhere. From this material, without consultation with any one else, these three young men made the "Bear Flag." Cowey had been a saddler, Duell had also served a short time at the same trade. To form the flag Duell and Cowey sewed together alternate strips of red, white and blue. Todd drew in the upper corner a star and painted on the lower the rude picture of a grizzly bear, which was not standing, as has sometimes been represented, but was drawn with his head down.

It will be observed that the descriptions of the flag in these two articles do not agree, but we are inclined to accept that of Dr. Semple, in that he was one of the principal actors in the revolution, and was present at Sonoma when the flag was hoisted, and was subsequently chosen by his comrades at Sonoma to gather the materials of their revolution together for record, which office he in part performed in 1846 and 1847. The following minutes of a meeting, published in the Californian of October 3, 1846, show what value may be attached to Semple's record:

A numerous meeting was held at the town of Sonoma on the 25th day of September, A. D. 1846, by a portion of foreigners who were engaged under the flag of the bear in revolutionizing California, with the avowed object of establishing a free, and efficient, and an independent government, when the meeting was organized by calling J. B. Chiles to the chair, and appointing John H. Nesh Secretary. On motion of Dr. Robert Semple, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That three persons be appointed to act as a committee to investigate, and gather all the information in their reach, in relation to the action of the Bear Flag party, and report at a subsequent meeting.

Resolved, That the committee have the power to call another meeting at such time and place as they may deem it necessary.

Whereupon, Dr. Robert Semple, Captain John Grigsby and John H. Nesh, were unanimously appointed the committee to carry into full effect the said resolutions on as early a day as practicable.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Californian.

When the meeting, on motion, adjourned sine die.

A true copy of the minutes.

JOHN H. NESH, Secretary.

Concerning Dr. Semple, the San Francisco Alla-California of October 29, 1854, said:

Dr. Robert Semple died on the morning of the 25th inst., at his home, fourteen miles south of Colusa. His death was caused by injuries received by a fall from his horse. Although known to not many of the later, Dr. Semple was well known to the earlier residents of California. He was a native of Kentucky, and came to California across the plains in 1846. Dr. Semple took a prominent part in the Bear Flag revolution in that year; and afterward located the city of Benicia, which, at the time, he owned almost entirely, and where he resided. He was elected a delegate to the convention for the formation of a State constitution in August, 1849, and was almost unanimously chosen President of that body, over which he presided with great ability and satisfaction. In company with the late Walter Colton, Dr. Semple established the first newspaper in California, at Monterey, in the year 1846. He was distinguished for an amiability of temper and a genial disposition, which endeared him to all who knew him.

An Old Primary Election Ticket.

In an old scrap book lent to us by a friend, there is pasted an ancient primary election ticket, used perhaps in 1856 or 1857 in this city. It reads: "First Ward. Regular Democratic ticket: Alfred Reddington, James Bowsted, W. E. Terry, James A. Duffy, G. C. Haswell, Harry Payne, W. T. Higgins, W. J. Cady, Johnson Price, Chas. J. Torbert, J. D. Carlton, M. Ault, Chas. H. Trainor, John C. Ledlie, W. F. Swinley, M. Coffey, James Reid. No proxies allowed. The majority of the delegation to cast the vote of the delegates. Polls open at the FORREST THEATER, J street, between Second and Third, from 4 to 9 o'clock P. M.

General Reddington was for many years the manager of the California Steam Navigation Company, and in 1868 was elected a Presidential Elector on the Republican ticket. He died in San Francisco, May 22, 1875. Bowstead conducted a foundry on Front street, and has been dead for years. Duffy was afterward elected Assemblyman and Senator from this county, then removed to San Francisco, and died at Oakland, September 16, 1889. Haswell removed to San Francisco, where he died some 15 years ago. Higgins afterward became a noted Republican boss, and died in San Francisco, August 21, 1889. Dr. Price was later on Secretary of State, and died in San Francisco, February 8, 1868. Torbert removed to the Bay, where he died May 8, 1889. Swinley for many years conducted a restaurant, and printed on his cards, "Happy and content are Swinley's boarders." He died here a long time ago. Ledlie, Terry and Trainor still live here. Cady and Ault now live in San Francisco. Payne is reported as having died elsewhere. Coffey in early days conducted a hotel that was destroyed in the great fire of 1852. He was the father of the present clerk of the water works, and died here in 1875.

Worn-out shoes have their uses. The Italian scavenger, who rakes up your ash barrel and sends the dust flying over your doorstep, knows this well, and his black eyes glisten at the sight of old leather. If the shoes are not worn to shreds, he sells them to a second-hand dealer, and they are patched up and resold; but if they are past mending, he takes them home to his cellar and rips them apart, or his wife and children do. The pieces he sells to a manufacturer. From the larger pieces, after being soaked till soft, the uppers of children's shoes are cut. The soles are cut into small pieces to make up the layers of the heels of other shoes, the iron pegs that are not bent can be used over again, and the little scraps that are left after this, are subjected to a treatment that makes them all one pliable mass, from which a kind of artistic leather is rolled out. This is used for covering chairs, books, trunks, boxes, etc. Many fancy patterns are stamped on it, and the trade in this kind of "embossed" leather in the United States is a well-established one.

A Dusting Machine.

A genius with a profound thought mill has taken up the subject of dusting and solving by means of suction draughts. He has a perambulating machine which, by means of fans and hydraulic pressure, gets a draught through a spiral hose, with a nozzle shaped at its terminus like the trombone end of a trombone. He starts up a grand racket on the carpet till the dust flies, then turns on this blizzard machine, and a condensed cyclone is immediately precipitated. He moves the hose end round and wherever the cloud of dust arises the suction of his mechanism draws it, and it immediately goes "up the spout," so to speak. This is one of the curiosities of the patent office.

The tomato is having a great run in London as a medicinal agent, especially for biliousness. One correspondent assures a leading journal that he found in the tomato a specific for a chronic throat trouble, and if there is any virtue in the vegetable as a hair renewer and corn cure, the extensive experimentation now going on will surely bring it out.

Calling a Halt.

St. Peter sat at the beautiful gate
And nodded over the keys;
As a cold chill blast through his gray beard passed,
He gave a decorous sneeze;
There came at the knocker a haughty blow,
And the old saint shivered. "Thought he, "I know
That's another author of 'Beautiful Snow'—
If I let him in I'll freeze!"
"They've been coming up from the Vale of Tears,
Of sexes and sizes all;
Some in bibs, some bowed 'neath the snows of years,
Some short, some 'divinely tall';
And every time I open the gate
Their snow drifts in on my anreoled pate—
If they keep on coming at such a rate
I'll give up my place in the fall.

"The Man Who Struck William Patterson"
Quit coming here long ago;
The 'Men in the Iron Mask,' one by one
Have come in—or gone below;
And I vow that I'll brain with my big brass key
The very next duffer who says to me;
'Pray let me enter, good sir, you see I'm the author of 'Beautiful Snow!'"

Shacabac on Love and Marriage.

That the greatest of sages did not escape the lot which seems to be peculiar to most philosophers, that of being unhappily wedded, is evident not only from the cynical tone of many of his writings, but also from the direct evidence of his contemporaries, writes Amasa B. Sewall in the Boston Globe.
Ben Haround relates that when he, on one occasion, urged the philosopher to obey the precept of the koran, which permits every true believer to take as many as four wives, Shacabac replied: "I have one and find it enough for this world. The balance I will take in hours." The one wife of Shacabac was a woman of singular vigor and intelligence. She never wearied of reminding her spouse that the prophet was always humble and industrious, that he kindled the fire, swept the floor, milked the ewes, mended his raiment, and was, above all things, totally abstemious. "That," the wise man would answer, "is where we differ, the prophet—may his name be blest!—and I.
Moreover, his wife was Cadajah, the ever faithful, who believed in him when all the world rejected him." Then he turned to his tables and wrote:

There is one man who knoweth less than all others on earth. It is he who is the husband to his wife. While Allah preserveth her his halo shall never grow too small for his head.

No man knoweth what true happiness is until he getteth married. Then, as usual, the knowledge cometh too late.

Twice blessed is he in whose tent dwelt both his mother and his wife's mother; for even though he gain not Paradise, yet shall he fear not Gehenna.

It is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all.

If thou wouldst be happy in love, study first the happiness of thy beloved. I know of no surer way to attain this end than by concentrating thine affections on thyself alone.

If thy wife sue for a divorce, conciliate her;
for thou mayest be able to hang her up on her weekly allowance, but an alimony order thou canst not hope to evade.

Politeness between husband and wife costeth nothing. If it did, it would be even scarcer than it is now.

A bird on toast is worth two on a bonnet.
Be not too presumptuous. If thou deemest thyself unworthy to tie thy wife's shoes, let her do it herself.

It is told by a follower of the great Caliph
Omar that in one of the books of the Alexandrian library he read the story of a very wise man who, being in love, decided—but, unhappily, at this point the caliph's order to burn all the books in the library was received, so that the world has lost forever the story of the only wise man who was ever in love.

Nature always supplies compensation. He of the lean purse hath always a large family. There are two ways of missing the joys of matrimony. One is by not getting married, the other by not being born. The prophet hath said there is a third, which is, by always overlooking the errors of thy partner. I know not if this be true or not, but it recalleth a parable.

There were two brothers of Bassorah who dwelt under the same roof, both being married. They had the misfortune, about the same time, to offend their wives most grievously. Amine, the wife of the elder, was so incensed that she never again spoke to her lord. Zobeide, the younger, not only forgave her spouse, but made it a point every day, in reminding him of his fault, to forgive him again most solemnly. Yet was the husband of Zobeide no happier than that of Amine.

It is a matter of tradition in Japan that fruit grows upon the bamboo when there is to be a famine in that country. This year bamboo trees are bearing fruit, and there is a famine.

On this 29th day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety, before me, a notary public, in and for said county, residing therein, duly commissioned and sworn, personally appeared W.
D. Lawton and Robert Barnett, known to me to be the persons described in, whose names are subscribed to the within instrument, and they acknowledged to me that they executed the same.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, the day and year in this certificate first above written.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAmento—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M.
RICHARD, Greeting:
You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July,
A. D. 1890.

To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony
now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere,
and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the second day of August, 1890, in which action John Ruedy is plaintiff and you are defendants. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, quieting title of plaintiff to the south 110 feet of Lot No. 5, and the south 110 feet of the east quarter of Lot 6, block bounded by D and E, and 6th and 7th Streets, in the City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, State of California, and directing defendants to appear and set forth their title, if any they have to said premises, and that defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim thereto, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere;
and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified,
the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, and State of California. In the matter of the estate of John Kohler, deceased.

It appearing to the Court from the petition this day filed and presented by John H. Sawyer, the executor of the estate of John Kohler, deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate belonging to said estate, to pay the debts, expenses and charges of administration:

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate appear before the said Superior Court, in Department Two, thereof, on Friday, the 19th day of September, A. D., 1890, at 10 o'clock, A. M., on said day, at the Court-room of said Court, in the Court-house in said City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.

Dated August 15, 1890.

So Long Ago,

As I sit, alone, by the firelight,
And watch the embers glow,
I dream of the little maid I loved
Ever so long ago.

Her name was Phyllis, and she was fair
And lovely, I'd have you know,
And she's been married a year or more—
It seems so long ago.

I was just twenty, and she sixteen—
We loved each other so.
And I myself am now married, too;
It was so long ago.

Of course we both swore we would be true,
And thought we should, you know;
But then, whatever can you expect?
It was so long ago.

Ah, well! 'tis too late, we both are wed,
Nor would I change, I trow,
For my wife to-day's the maid I loved,
Ever so long ago.

"When nature wanted to show the folly of beauty," said the strong-minded woman, "it created the weak-headed, curled darlings we see in fashion plates. But when it desired to make clear the beauty of wisdom it made the hard-headed woman with no nonsense about her."

"Yes, ma'am, certainly," said an unawed listener. "But don't you think in the latter case she made it rather too plain?"

"There is one solace left to me at least," remarked the old farmer. "After all my boys leave and go into business, after the pigs and cattle die, and everything else for-sakes me, there is at least one thing that will stick to the old farm."

"And that is—?"

"The mortgage!"

WOMEN AND MICE.

The reason why a woman is afraid of a mouse is a profound mystery—indeed, it has never been very clearly proven that she is. But some women are constantly in such a nervous, irritable condition that the slightest thing annoys and startles them. The cause of this unfortunate state of affairs is usually some functional derangement; some distressing or painful irregularity, some derangement or peculiar weakness incident to her sex; or, it may be due to inflammation, ulceration or displacement, of some of the pelvic viscera, or to other organic lesions peculiar to her sex. From whichever cause it may arise, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a positive remedy, so certain in its curative results that its manufacturers sell it, through druggists, under a guarantee of its giving satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded. As a soothing and strengthening nerve, "Favorite Prescription" is unequalled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

—N. Y. World.

A flower has been discovered in South America which is only visible when the wind blows. The shrub belongs to the cactus family, and is about three feet high. The stem is covered with dead, warty-looking lumps in calm weather. These lumps, however, need but a slight breeze to make them unfold large flowers of a creamy white, which close and appear dead as soon as the wind subsides.

A wonderful flower has been discovered in the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Its chief peculiarity is the habit of changing its colors during the day. In the morning it is white; when the sun is at its zenith it is red, and at night it is blue. The red, white, and blue flower grows on a tree about the size of a guava tree, and only at noon does it give out any perfume.

SOLE MANUFACTURERS' AGENT.

631 J STREET, Sacramento, Cal.

From Sig. Martinez, Concert Solo Pianist.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist.

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stenciled and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't all go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business.

THEMIS

Vol. II.

SACRAMENTO: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1890.

No. 29.

THEMIS: published weekly, by A. J. Johnston & Co. Publication Office, 410 J Street. Subscription—One year, by mail, $3 00; six months, by mail, $1 50, in advance; per month, by carrier, 25 cents. (Entered at the Post Office at Sacramento as second-class matter.)

The Prohibition County Convention met in this city last week and placed in the field a partial ticket. The platform is brief and to the point—a wise feature that does not characterize all political conventions. While there can be no question generally of the merits of the cause of the Prohibition party, and while the universal sentiment of the intelligent is that reasonable restraint should be placed upon the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, the time is hardly ripe for absolute prohibition. The most that can be done in this day will be in the way of curtailment; that is coming about gradually, and is the natural consequence of our advancing civilization. The majority of our people drink liquors, wines and beer in moderation, and are not disposed to countenance the absolute prohibition of their manufacture and sale. The minority are divided into two classes: those who drink to excess, and those who do not drink and desire that no one else shall. The fact that some lose self-control is hardly a reason why the temperate should not enjoy their table wine or drink a glass of beer. Perhaps among our people the custom of treating is the most pernicious feature, and it should be abolished. In the older countries every man pays for what he gets, and it is regarded as an insult for one to offer to pay for a drink for another. The result is that drinking is more in moderation. With us a man is expected to call up all in the saloon with whom he is acquainted or who may be introduced to him in the room, and the recipients of his favor feel that the amenities demand they shall in turn reciprocate. It comes about that where a man intended to take but one drink he leaves with three or four, and perhaps several cigars. However, it is that of late years this custom of treating is dying out, and the better element of saloon keepers realize its growing unpopularity. In most first-class saloons there are no chairs in the barroom, no newspapers, and no inducement for lounging. It results that more individual drinks are sold, and that customers will come who would otherwise stay away for fear they would have to "set them up" for a crowd. Another evil is the lower grade of saloons; they can, however, be easily regulated or closed; and there is no question they should be. Coming down, however, to the absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal and scientific purposes, it is impracticable. In this city, for instance, within the last year, some of our most prominent business men embarked over half a million of dollars in a brewery establishment, and their trade now extends all over the Coast. It is hardly possible that any considerable following could be found who would vote to shut down their establishment.

Our Prohibition friends are to be commended for their courage and independence. They made up their county ticket without reference to the candidates that had or may be nominated by any other party. Therefore it will be the vote it will receive will be cast by those who are sincerely in sympathy with their principles. Such a course wins the respect of members of other parties. When a ticket is made up in part of nominees of other parties, there is a suspicion there is a "piece club" organization behind it, and a strong reminder of past political history. There was a time, and not many years ago, that designing men inaugurated "independent" movements and secret political clubs, by which a candidate would be indorsed on terms to be made known by the Captain. It resulted in nominees being mercilessly robbed; the few on the inside pocketed the coin, while the majority who participated from the best of motives never realized they had been made the instruments for injustice and blackmail. The policy that has been pursued of late years by the leading political parties, of discouraging candidates from responding to the managers of "piece clubs" has been salutary, and they are now about a thing of the past.

We notice that the Funded Debt Commissioners have advertised the redemption of certain bonds and coupons, fixing a price for different dates. The bonds which fell due in 1888 seem to receive great favor by this board. The price established is 65 per cent. When we consider that these bonds bear no interest, and that there is no probability of liquidation until the interest on the entire debt has been paid, which will extend at least until 1923, and perhaps several years later, sixty-five per cent. is a very large figure. If our honorable board desires to continue its little broker business and speculation at a small discount on overdue coupons and bonds, it would be much more in place to deal only in those which might constitute an immediate obligation on the city, rather than that which does not bear any interest and which cannot be any source of annoyance to us for at least fifteen years. As an illustration, what would an individual note for $1,000, payable fifteen years after date without interest, be worth as a commercial commodity? Certainly not 40 per cent. Now that is our situation with all the bonds due in 1888. They bear no interest; payment cannot be enforced, thus they are of little commercial value. Yet our Funded Debt Commission, by this act, fixes the market value at 65 per cent. This is wrong, and not based on any business principles. Use your money, gentlemen—since it has been the misguided will of the Legislature that you may do this broker business—in a manner that some relief, small though it may be, may come to the city. There is only a small margin for speculative purposes on most of the bonds and coupons, this board having by its course raised the value of all the bonds and coupons to near par—some at par. Yet in the face of these facts there are those who proclaim the Funded Debt Commission a blessing to the city. If we had another such a "blessing" there would be little left of this tax-ridden city.

The situation of municipal matters in Sacramento city is deplorable. It is openly charged by the press, and the opinion is entertained by the citizens generally, that two of the City Trustees are venial. We very much regret that such a matter could even be insinuated, much more that it should be openly charged and not denied. In the matter of the extension of the franchise of the Central Street Railway Company we have remained silent, in that the other journals of this city were disposed to favor it, and the people understood we would lend any assistance in our power to bring capital into our city, and foster improvements. There is an interesting retrospect. When the question of the granting of the franchise to the Central Street Railway Company originally came up, it was bitterly fought, and significantly the very two Trustees, who have within the past week placed themselves in a questionable attitude, opposed it. A portion of the press opposed it, but it seems there has been experienced a change with them; with us there has not. In the matter of the granting of the franchise to the New Electric Light Company, it will be recollected that THEMIS stood alone of the journals of Sacramento to encourage the investment of that capital. The daily press fought against the incoming of that enterprise until the very last. However, it was, the franchise was granted and we have now the lights. We are gratified that the time has come when the daily press take the same view of local improvements that we have. It is little of news to the readers of this journal that there are two questionable members of the Board of City Trustees. In the past we have been disposed to mitigate their acts upon the ground of ignorance. Mayor Comstock enjoys the confidence of this community. We only regret he is not more familiar with the duties of his office. We can but repeat what we have heretofore said, that the people of this city are entitled to no commiseration. They have simply, by their indifference, placed in the management of their affairs men incompetent at least, and the commentary that capital and enterprise is suppressed is not commendable. It has come that those from abroad who manifest a disposition to invest their capital in enterprises here, have to pass the gauntlet of the smaller politicians. The improvements and the advance made in this city in the last few years have been brought about by private citizens, and not by our governing board. It would seem that men chosen to dignified and honorable positions should so conduct themselves in office that universal adverse criticism should not be passed upon their acts.

The great annual State reunion and exhibition of the enterprising business elements, with the agricultural, manufacturing and art resources of the State, will commence next Monday in this city. So complete has been the management of these annual expositions, tournaments and festivals, that each succeeding year develops greater perfection. The finest and fastest horses are with us. The manufacturing exhibits are equal to any in the United States. The productions of the soil are unequalled. No State can present a more choice art exhibition. Our California artists, with the magnificent field for inspiration, have transferred to canvass the brightest poetry of nature, and whose choicest works adorn the walls of the great art hall of the pavilion. The exhibition hall is an instructor for the people who gather here on these annual reunions, where lessons in the arts, sciences, agriculture, mechanics, are taught through the true object process. There is combined with the instructive the most pleasurable amusements. At the Park the fastest blooded horses will contend for supremacy on the turf, while blooded stock of all kinds invite the attention of the lovers of the development of these great enterprises. Our State Fair is the great institution of the coast. No matter what may be said about dull times, short crops and other tales of woe, the State Fair management has completely refuted all these complaints and developed the fact that in all the departments which go to make such exhibitions a success, there is nothing lacking, and that in truth and in fact there will be a finer display than at any former festival. These annual gatherings are of the greatest benefit to the people. On these occasions we all meet on a level. The poorest has the same rights and privileges with the most affluent. The wonders of nature's work, and the grandest production of art and science are open to all.

THE BEAR FLAG REVOLUTION.

The First History that was Published of it in 1846—A Narrative by a Participant and the Authorized Historian of the Party—Names of those who Engaged in the Movement.

The fortieth anniversary of the admission of California into the Union will be celebrated on the 9th inst., at San Francisco, by the Pioneers and Native Sons, and from the preparations that have been made the event will be one of note in the history of the State. In that the circumstances connected with the Bear Flag revolution of 1846, and the raising of the famous banner, are intimately interwoven with the pioneer history of California, and that confusion exists as to many of the details, we felt this an appropriate time to reproduce from the first newspaper printed in California, a description of the Bear Flag and an account of the revolution. Last week we reproduced from the Californian of 1847, Dr. Semple's description of the flag, and the proceedings of a meeting of the members of the party appointing him and others a committee to gather materials for a history of the movement. The doctor performed his work, and published his history in a series of articles in his paper, commencing a little over two months after the flag was raised and the movement inaugurated. Semple was an active participant in the revolution, and was therefore in a position to know whereof he wrote. His account is accepted by historians as being the most accurate, being written nearest the time of the happening of the events, and was designed to be historical. We are not aware of the existence of but one file of his paper; that is in the State Library and is well worn. We deem it proper to reproduce the doctor's articles in extenso, and have followed his punctuation, and the spelling of proper names literally.

So far as can now be ascertained, the following is believed to be the most accurate list of the members of the Bear Flag party:

Sacramento Valley: Ezekiel Merritt, Robert Semple, William Fallon, William B. Ide, Henry L. Ford, Granville P. Swift, Samuel Neal, William Potter, Samuel Gibson, W. M. Scott, James Gibbs, Horace Sanders, Peter Storm.

Napa: Samuel Kelsey, Benjamin Kelsey, John Grigsby, David Hudson, William Hargrave, Harrison Pierce, William Porterfield, Patrick McChristian, Elias Barrett, C. C. Griffith, William L. Todd, Nathan Coombs, Lucien Maxwell.

Sonoma: Franklin Bidwell, Thomas Cowie, — Fowler, William B. Elliott, Benjamin Duell, John Sears, "Old Red."

Others were connected with the movement, but it cannot be ascertained if they were present at the capture of Sonoma. They were:

William Knight, Thomas Knight, Henry Booker, J. H. Kelly, John Scott, Ira Stebbins, Marion Wise, — Ferguson, Bartlett Vines and Andrew Kelsey.

The following are the articles written and published by Dr. Semple:

NUMBER 1.

Californian, August 22, 1846.

This being the only paper published in California, it is desirable, that it should not only be interesting for its news, but conducted in such a manner as to make it useful as a history of the country, we have therefore determined to publish a series of numbers devoted to that subject, in which will be embodied the state of the country, public opinion, the circumstances which led to the present outbreak, and principles and conduct of the actors.

The population of California is estimated of about 10,000, exclusive of Indians, and probably less than 2,000 of that number are foreigners, most of these originally from the United States. The latter was rapidly increasing by immigration, while the natives were, if increasing at all, but slowly. The fact became evident, to a few men, that, under the present state of things, this tide of foreigners, would soon fill up the country, and probably change the very nature of their institutions, they were preparing to prevent it, but before entering upon a history of the measures adopted, we shall premise a few facts in relation to the actors on the part of the Californians.

But little more than a year ago, General Micheltoreno, the Governor appointed by the Government of Mexico, was in power, Don Jose Castro, Alvarado, Pico and others, complained of the oppressions of the Governor, and accordingly got up a party to depose him, composed of Californians and foreigners, a number of foreigners also on the side of the Governor. Much warlike preparation was made and some long marches, but without a battle; or at least, without the loss of human life, it finally resulted in Pico's assuming the station of Governor, and Castro Commander of the military, the situation of both Mexico and California, cannot be better described, than in the following paragraph from the New York Herald.

"The stupidity and weakness of the people, and the selfishness and tyranny of their military officers and government, have reduced Mexico to the lowest grade of degradation and infamy. The sun never shone on a more beautiful country, and the God of nature never dispensed his favors to a greater degree than he has on this now unfortunate country. Yet notwithstanding these natural advantages, Mexico, from certain causes, is now the meanest and lowest in the category of nations. Her people are ruled with a rod of iron, and are sunk in imbecility and infamy; her military rulers are the most despotic and mercenary that ever exercised power; through the effects of successive revolutions, all confidence in government is gone—she is without an army or navy, and her coffers are empty. There is a never ending struggle, by a set of designing men, to attain the management of the national affairs, and the only principle that guides them is self aggrandizement. Such is the condition of Mexico at the present time, and such it has been for a number of years."

In this state of things, General Castro issued one proclamation after another, ordering the foreigners to leave the country, and in some instances without arms. The people well knowing the character of the "Commandante," still remained quiet, but at last the decisive blow was struck, which forced us to rally and defend ourselves, or run for the mountains.

Californian, August 29, 1846.

The movement alluded to in our last number which brought about the movement on the part of the Americans at the time it occurred, was an order from Don Jose Castro, to Lieutenant Francisco de Arce, at Sonoma, to move with fourteen men as a guard, for some horses belonging to the government, which were at the Mission of San Raphael, and report them at headquarters, which was at that time at the Mission of Santa Clara.

The Lieutenant was under the necessity of passing up the Sacramento, on the north side to cross at New Helvetia, the first point at which the horses could swim the river. On his trip he was seen by an Indian, who came in, and reported that he had seen 200 or 300 armed men on horseback advancing up the Sacramento, at a point, that made it very evident, if the Indian had been correct that Castro was at the head of a large party, with the intention of attacking Captain Fremont, who was at that time encamped at the Butts, [Buttes] near the junction of Feather river with the Sacramento. The news traveled with the speed of the swiftest horses, among all the Americans, in a scope of country, 150 miles in extent, in 24 hours from every direction, we rushed in to assist Captain Fremont, under the impression that if he was defeated, that we should be taken at our homes as had been reported, by forming the junction with him, we availed ourselves of his assistance, but on our arrival at the camp the truth was ascertained. Mr. Knight there met us with the information that Francisco had told him that the General had sent for the horses which he then had, for the purpose of mounting a battalion of 200 men to march against the Americans, settled in the Sacramento Valley, and that he (the Gen.) intended to build a fort near the Bear river pass, in the California mountains, for the purpose of preventing the ingress of the expected emigration.

The time had now arrived when some decisive move had to be made. The day for union of action had arrived. The proposition was made, that a sufficient company should follow the Lieutenant and take the horses, not only for the purpose of weakening our enemy, but if possible, induce him to cross the American Fork, where we kept the property and at a point which would give us the advantage. Without waiting for organization or plan, 12 men volunteered to go. Mr. Merritt, the oldest of the party was named as the leader.

We left the Butts, 55 miles above the American fork, at 10 o'clock in the morning, and by night crossed it, and there ascertained that the cavalcade had passed there in the afternoon, stopped and rested our horses and got supper, and at daylight on the morning of the 10th of June, we surprised the Lieutenant in camp near the Macosamy [Cosumnes] river, who, without resistance gave up his arms, and the government horses.

We had no disposition to be troubled with prisoners, we therefore, dismissed him with his party, with their arms and a horse for each—one private individual, who claimed not to be of the party, and the owner of six horses. Mr. Merritt informed him, that our object was not to interfere with private property, and that he was at liberty to turn out his horses, which he did. On dismissing the party, they were informed that the property which we had taken would be kept together, and we wished them to tell the General to come after them, but to bring with him force enough to get them. This was the first overt act on the part of the foreigners, which commenced the revolution, and opened the breach so wide that it was necessary that all should take grounds for one side or the other. This act was immediately followed by the taking of the town and Mission of Sonoma, which occurred on the morning of the 14th, our little party had been augmented to 33, still under command of Mr. Merritt. At Sonoma, we made prisoners of General Guadalupe, M. Vallejo [M. G. Vallejo], Lieutenant Colonel Prndon, and Captain Don Salvador Vallejo. This move was made under the impression that the General had a very great influence in the country, and by securing him we might secure our object with less bloodshed and with a better effect upon the people of California.

As we have now got through the first movements of the revolutionists, it will not be amiss to give some idea of the people with whom we have had to deal.

Our remarks in our last number, in relation to Mexico, are strictly true as regards California, but is only applicable to a few men, who kept the country in a constant excitement, with no other object in view, than their own advancement. The great mass of the people of California, are a quiet, inoffensive people, and but for those ambitious leaders, would remain on their ranches, a contented and happy community, and under a good government, would be valuable citizens, many of them are men of fine sense, and high moral worth, though from the very nature of their government, they have been deprived of the means of education to a great extent.

The ladies, who are numerous, are handsome, and some of them beautiful, very sprightly, industrious, and amiable in their manners, affectionate to their relations and friends, kind to their neighbors, and generous even to their enemies, and we are much in hopes that their mild and genial influence will go far to bring about that unity of feelings which is so desirable between the old and the new citizens of this highly favored country.

NUMBER 3.

Californian, September 5, 1846.

From the facts which took place at the taking of Sonoma, I feel justified in saying that the world has not, hitherto, manifested so high a state of civilization. The reader will remember that the party which took Sonoma, consisted of 33 men, gathered in the country, without officers, or the slightest degree of organization, and with no publicly declared object, and each man having felt the oppression of the then existing government, and the certainty of an increase of those oppressions, with a clear sense of their danger, their rights, and their duty, they rushed to the rescue with one impulse and one object, the watchword was equal rights and equal laws, and they nobly sustained their principles.

Sonoma was taken without a struggle, in which place was 9 pieces of artillery, about 200 stand of small arms, of public property, which was taken possession of. There was also a large amount of private property, and a considerable amount of money, which was known to the victors, a single man cried out, "Let us divide the spoils," but one universal, dark, indignant frown, made him shrink from the presence of honest men, and from that time forward no man dared to hint anything like violating the sanctity of a private house, or touching private property, so far did they carry this principle, that they were unwilling to take the beef which was offered by our prisoner. The General sent for his cavalcade and offered them fresh horses which was accepted, but with the determination of reimbursing him, as soon as the new government should be established. The party had been made, mostly of hunters, and such men as could leave home at the shortest notice, they had not time to dress, even if they had had fine clothes, so that almost the whole party was dressed in leather hunting shirts, and many of them very greasy;—taking the whole party together, they were about as rough a looking set of men as one could well imagine. It is not to be wondered at, that one would feel some dread at falling into their hands, but the prisoners, instead of being dragged away with rough hands and harsh treatment, met with nothing but the kindest of treatment and the most polite attention from the whole party, and in fact before five hours ride from their homes they seemed to feel all confidence, and conversed very freely on the subject of the establishment of a better government, gave their opinions and their plans without any apparent restraint.

The writer cannot leave this part of the subject without telling an anecdote, which will illustrate the character of one of the actors in this scene. A year or two previous, one of the prisoners (Salvador Vallejo) in an official capacity, had fallen in with Mr. Merritt, the leader of the revolutionary party, and under the pretense that Mr. Merritt had harbored a runaway man of war's man, beat him severely with his sword. With all the keen resentment of a brave man, Mr. Merritt suddenly found the same man in his power; the blood rushed to his cheeks, and his eyes sparkled; he leaned forward like a mad tiger in the act of springing upon his prey, and in an energetic but manly tone, said: "When I was your prisoner, you struck me; now you are my prisoner, I will not strike you." The motives which had prompted him to act in the present contest, were too high, too holy, to permit him for a moment to suffer his private feelings to bias him in his public duties. However able may be the pen which shall record these events, none but those who have witnessed the moderation and uniform deportment of the little garrison left at Sonoma, can do them justice, for there has been no time in the history of the world, where, men without law, without officers, without the scratch of a pen, as to the object had in view, has acted with that degree of moderation and strict observance of persons and property as was witnessed on this occasion. Their children, in generations yet to come, will look back with pleasure, upon the commencement of a revolution carried on by their fathers, upon principles high and holy as the laws of eternal justice.

A small garrison was left at Sonoma, consisting of about 18 men, under command of William B. Ide, which in the course of a few days was increased to about 40. On the 18th day of June, Mr. Ide, by the consent of the garrison, published a proclamation setting forth the objects, for which the party had gathered, and the principle which would be adhered to in the event of their success. The paper itself is plain and concise, and needs no comments of mine to recommend it.

A Proclamation to all persons and citizens of the District of Sonoma, requesting them to remain at peace, and follow their rightful occupations without fear of molestation:

The Commander-in-Chief of the troops assembled at the fortress of Sonoma, gives his inviolable pledge to all persons in California, not found under arms, that they shall not be disturbed in their persons, their property, or social relations, one with another, by men under his command.

He also solemnly declares his object to be, first to defend himself and companions in arms, who were invited to this country by a promise of lands on which to settle themselves and families; who were also promised a republican government, when having arrived in California were denied the privilege of buying or renting lands to their friends, who instead of being allowed to participate in, or being protected by a republican government, were oppressed by a military despotism; who were even threatened by proclamation, by the chief officers of the aforesaid despotism, with extermination if they should not depart out of the country, leaving all their property, arms, and beasts of burden, and thus deprived of the means of flight or defense, we were to be driven through deserts inhabited by hostile Indians, to certain destruction.

To overthrow a government which has seized upon the property of the missions for its individual aggrandizement; who has ruined and shamefully oppressed the laboring people of California, by their enormous exactions on goods imported into the country, is the determined purpose of the brave men who are associated under my command.

I also solemnly declare my object, in the second place, to be to invite all peaceful and good citizens of California, who are friendly to the maintenance of good order and equal rights, and I do hereby invite them to repair to my camp at Sonoma, without delay, to assist us in establishing and perpetuating a republican government, which shall secure to us all civil and religious liberty; which shall encourage virtue and literature; which shall leave unshackled by fetters, Agriculture, Commerce and Manufactures.

I further declare that I rely upon the rectitude of our intentions, the favor of Heaven, and the bravery of those who are bound and associated with me, by the principles of self-preservation; by the love of truth, and the hatred of tyranny, for my hopes of success.

I furthermore declare, that I believe that a government to be prosperous and happy, must originate with the people who are friendly to its existence; that the citizens are its guardians; the officers are its servants, its glory its reward.

WILLIAM B. IDE,

Headquarters, Sonoma, June 18, 1846.

NUMBER 4.

Californian, September 12, 1846.

About the time the foregoing proclamation was issued two young men, Mr. T. Cowie and Mr. Fowler, who lived in the neighborhood, started to go to the Bodega; on their way they were discovered by a small party of Californians, under command of one Padilla, and taken prisoners; they were kept as prisoners for one day and a half, and then tied to trees and cut to pieces in the most brutal manner, a Californian, known as four fingered Jack, has been since captured, and gives the following account of that horrible scene: The party after keeping the prisoners a day or two, tied them to trees, then stoned them, one of them had his jaw broken, a riata (rope) was made fast to the broken bone and the jaw dragged out, they were then cut up, a small piece at a time and the pieces thrown at them, or crammed in their throats, and they were eventually dispatched by cutting out their bowels.

Fortunately for humanity, those cold blooded savage murderers were soon put to an end, by the very active measures which were taken by the garrison at Sonoma, having heard nothing of the arrival of Cowie and Fowler at their place of destination, suspected that they had been taken, and probably killed, and hearing that three others were prisoners in Padilla's camp, Captain Ford, (then First Lieutenant) headed a party of 22 men, officers included, and took the road for the enemy's camp, which had, by this time, been reinforced by Captain Joaquin de la Torre, with 70 men, it was reported that their headquarters was at Santa Rosa plains, to which point Ford proceeded, finding they had left, followed them in the direction of San Rafael, and after traveling all night making about 60 miles in 16 hours, came up with the enemy 12 miles from San Rafael, where they had stopped to get breakfast. The enemy occupied a position at a house on the edge of the plains, about 60 yards from a small grove of brushwood. Captain Ford having several prisoners, left 4 men to guard them, and with the remainder, advanced at full charge upon the enemy, as soon as he got them in motion he fell back into the brushwood, directed his party to tie their horses and take such positions as would cut off the Spaniards, but by no means fire until they would get a man, which order was so well obeyed, that out of 20 or 25 shots fired by the Americans, 11 took effect, 8 of the enemy were killed, 2 wounded, and one horse shot through the neck. One party of the Californians led by a Sergeant, whose name we have not been able to get, charged up handsomely, but the deadly fire of Ford's riflemen forced them to retire, with the loss of the Sergeant and several of his men. The fall of the Sergeant seemed to be the signal for retreat, the whole party retired to a high hill about a mile from the field of battle. Ford and his gallant followers, waiting a short time, and finding that the enemy showed no disposition to return to the fight, released the prisoners, who had been taken by the enemy, and then went to a corral, where they found a large cavada of horses, and exchanged their tired horses for fresh ones, and took the road for Sonoma. The Californians on this occasion, did not sustain the reputation they had previously gained; they were 86 strong, while Captain Ford had but 18 men engaged.

On the day following this engagement, Major Fremont having heard that Don Jose Castro was crossing the bay with 200 men marched immediately, and joined the garrison at Sonoma, on the 23d of June. Several days were spent in active pursuit of the party under Captain de la Torre, but they succeeded in crossing the bay before they could be overtaken by Fremont. With the retreat of de la Torre, ended all opposition on the north side of the bay of San Francisco.

On the 17th of June, upon receipt of the news of the taking of Sonoma, Don Jose Castro, issued two proclamations, one addressed to the old citizens, and the other to the new citizens and foreigners, both of them are well written. I shall here insert them that my readers may see from the sequel, how much sincerity there was in them.

The citizen, Jose Castro, Lieutenant-Colonel of Cavalry in the Mexican army, and acting General Commandante of the Department of California:

Fellow citizens.—The contemptible policy of the agents of the United States of North America, in this department, has induced a portion of adventurers, who regardless of the rights of men, have daringly commenced an invasion, possessing themselves of the town of Sonoma, taking by surprise all that place, the military commander of that border, Colonel Don Mariano Gnadalupe Vallejo, Lieutenant-Colonel Don Victor Prudon, Captain Don Salvador Vallejo and Mr. Jacob P. Leese.

Fellow Countrymen.—The defense of our liberty, the true religion which our fathers possessed, and our independence calls upon us to sacrifice ourselves rather than lose these inestimable blessings; banish from your hearts all petty resentments, turn you, and behold yourselves, these families, these innocent little ones, which have unfortunately fallen into the hands of our enemies; dragged from the bosoms of their fathers, who are prisoners among foreigners, and are calling upon us to succor them. There is still time for us to rise "en masse" as irresistible as retributive. You need not doubt but that divine providence will direct us in the way to glory. You should not vacillate because of the smallness of the garrison of the General Headquarters, for he who first will sacrifice himself, will be your friend and fellow citizen.

JOSE CASTRO.

Headquarters, Santa Clara, June 17th, 1846.

Citizen Jose Castro, Lieutenant Colonel of Artillery in the Mexican army, and acting General Commander of the department of upper California.

All foreigners residing among us, occupied with their business, may rest assured of the protection of all the authorities of the department, whilst they refrain entirely from all revolutionary movements.

The general commandancia under my charge will never proceed with vigor against any persons, neither will its authority result in mere words, wanting proof to support it, declaration shall be taken, proofs executed, and the liberty and rights of the laborious, which is ever commendable, shall be protected.

Let the fortune of war take its chance with those ungrateful men, who with arms in their hands, have attacked the country, without recollecting they were treated by the undersigned with all the indulgence of which he is so characteristic. The impertinent inhabitants of the department are witnesses to the truth of this. I have nothing to fear, my duty leads me to death or to victory. I am a Mexican soldier, and I will be free and independent, or I will gladly die for these inestimable blessings.

JOSE CASTRO.

Headquarters, Santa Clara, June 17th, 1846.

This ends the narrative of Dr. Semple concerning the Bear Flag revolution, though on March 20, 1847, he published another article, but it referred to military and naval operations under the authority of the United States government. On May 29th, 1847, after the doctor had removed the Californian from Monterey to San Francisco, he republished his series of articles on the Bear Flag revolution, with the following explanation:

In the second number of the Californian we commenced the publication of a series of numbers headed "California," written by myself an eye witness of the facts, which was at the time, intended to be continued as a history of the military movements, but from circumstances which we could not foresee, they were discontinued. It is now desirable to give them a more extensive circulation and we shall therefore republish them together.

There are one or two unimportant facts which subsequent information has convinced us, is untrue. One is that the party under Lieutenant H. L. Ford, at the battle of the Petaluma killed eight Californians. This statement was made from the fact that about that number of horses were seen without riders and their character for riding induced the belief that they were slain, but we cannot ascertain that there were more than two killed and two wounded.

The "Four fingered Jack," mentioned in connection with the murder of Cowie and Fowler, was unquestionably the notorious outlaw "Three-fingered Jack," killed by Captain Harry Love's Rangers, July 27, 1853, at Pinola Pass, near the Merced river, with the notorious bandit, Joaquin Murietta.

Captain William B. Ide, who issued the proclamation of independence, was a native of Ohio, and arrived overland at Sutter's Fort, in October, 1845. On June 7th, 1847, Colonel Mason, the Military Governor, appointed him land surveyor for the northern district of California and Justice of the Peace at Cache Creek. He secured an extensive grant of land in Colusa county, and was elected first County Treasurer, and afterward County Judge, and practiced law. He died of smallpox at Monroeville, December 18, 1852, aged 50 years.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

A new comedy is called The Razor. If the thing pulls it won't draw.

Fanny Davenport's board costs her $3 a week. She lives wholly on toast almost black with carbon, and weak green tea.

Hoey, in A Parlor Match this season, will sing a song that is expected to make a bigger hit than "Good Bye," Its title is "Hauled Me Back Again."

Billy Emerson, the prince of minstrels, is again a member of one of Manager Cleveland's companies. Next season he will head a company of his own.

Fanny Davenport is said to have brought two asps home with her. One, of course, has an important role in Cleopatra, and the other is its understudy.

Mr. and Mrs. Kendal have purchased for their next American tour a new one-act piece which contains a strong part for Mrs. Kendal. The new piece will not be played in England before it is seen in the United States.

Mr. Augustin Daly, being called to testify in a law court some months ago, was asked to define an original play. "I cannot," he replied. "Why not?" demanded the lawyer. "Because," said Mr. Daly, "there is no such thing as an original play." * * *

Jennie Williams, who began her stage life in San Francisco at ten years of age, eleven years ago, in Led Astray, is about to marry the third son of the eleventh Baron Peter, whose mother was Lady Catherine Howard, the youngest daughter of the Earl of Wicklow.

The details of the detected smuggling of Fay Templeton's diamonds and the love story hinted at as being behind it, all go to make up one of the most effective advertisements ever given to a theatrical star. Miss Templeton's manager has a large head, which he uses for thinking.

Money Mad. "A capital title and a clever play, and in the parlance of the day a money-maker. Melo-dramas like Dicken's novels deal with low life or the life of the poorer classes. The people always want melo drama. The bulwarks of society as Ibsen finds is 'not so much to leave undone as to keep unknown.' But on the stage it is different and we like to tickle our palate with the truly good and the truly bad man."

It chanced that a day or two after our evening at the theater the Percys gave a dinner party, at which Mr. Crosse and I were present. The conversation turned on the character of Kean's revivals at the Princess theater. Some one praised the mise en scene, to which Douglas Jerrold immediately retorted: "Oh, yes; it is all scenery and Keanery." He never lost the opportunity of a sarcastic fling at the favorite actor of the day, and proceeded on this occasion to indulge in such ungenerous ridicule and such violent abuse of Charles Kean that Miss Kinglake, who was present, could stand it no longer, and, turning sharply upon him, said: "Mr. Douglas Jerrold, from your unbounded abuse of Mr. Kean, I can only draw the conclusion that you are in love with Ellen Tree, and that she refused you, preferring Charles Kean!"—Temple Bar.

When Charles Mathews produced My Awful Dad he was charged with plagiarism. He wrote apologetically to the papers. He said that he knew that the theme of a frolicsome father with a serious son had already been treated in the Pere Prodigue, of Dumas the younger, but he had tried to give an airy version of the original. The critics went to the Pere Prodigue. They examined it attentively, and they thought it wonderful that Charles Mathews had made so rattling a farce from so sombre a comedy. But the truth is that Charles Mathews had neither seen nor read La Pere Prodigue. He had followed, in closest detail, a farce written by Labiche and Anicet-Bourgeois and produced in Paris, May 1, 1858, and under the name of L'Avare en gants jaunes, with Delannoy as the Awful Dad and Ravel as his son. The critics were thrown entirely off the scent.

A college man to Iliades went,
Some things he wished to learn;
They sent him back to earth because
He was too green to burn.

Tennison is fond of receiving visits from pretty young girls who like his poetry. While he is grumpy to older callers, he is at his best when the young girls are around, and recites his poetry to them and makes himself agreeable generally.

Onida has abandoned the beautiful villa of San where she has lived for many years and done much of her best work, for Florence, where she occupies the first floor of a spacious old palace.

Queen Victoria is on the eve of publishing another book. It consists of letters written by her husband, the late Prince Consort, to the late Emperor William (then Prince Regent of Prussia) and to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

Swinburne the poet has done his best to slay the Czar with a poem. He evidently believes that the pen is mightier than the sword. It is doubtful in this instance, however, if the pen proves more deadly than the bomb. The Czar seems to stand up well against both.

The humor of a writer is very much like the odor of a flower; the intellect may say it is good or bad, delicate or coarse, kindly or cruel; but it is the taste of the reader that welcomes or rejects it, as one man is sickened by the scent of a tuberose, another unaware of the subtle perfume of a white violet.

Mme. Dieulafoy, the well-known Persian archaeologist and novelist, rides her horse like a man, even in the streets of Paris. She wore the male habit in her journeying and excavations with her distinguished husband, and now she likes it so well that she is most at ease in it, though wearing regulation dress generally in the evenings.

The United States Book Company has filed articles of incorporation at Trenton, N. J. The company has absorbed all the business in low-priced publications which has been carried on hitherto by twenty-one concerns. The concern will have no competition in the publication of low-priced books. The company has bought out publishing houses in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago.

Recently there has been discovered a veritable relic of Balzac, an album which the great man had constantly with him and in which he scribbled—for scribbling is all his chirography can be called—many thoughts and expressions which have found their way into his novels. The book also contains a number of fragments, wholly unpublished, which will go to augment the never-completed "Comedie Humaine."

Professional Chat.

Under the present statutes of Missouri a person may be married, divorced and remarried within 31 days.

A Pittsburg man has sued his lawyer because he lost his case. If he wins won't the precedent be disturbing and discouraging to the legal profession?

"I notice," said a minister, "a deplorable tendency on the part of my congregation to lapse from grace. I am very much pained to observe that this backsliding has taken the form of an increased membership in the choir."

A Judge in a neighboring State once intervened to prevent a waste of words. He was sitting in chambers, and seeing from the piles of papers in the lawyers' hands that the first case was likely to be hardly contested, he asked: "What is the amount in question?" "Two dollars," said the plaintiff's counsel. "I'll pay it," said the Judge, handing over the money. "Call the next case." He had not the patience of taciturn Sir William Grant, who, after listening for a couple of days to the arguments of counsel as to the construction of an Act, quietly observed when they had done: "That Act has been repealed."

There is a large coinage of thoroughly good stories about Hon. Hannibal Hamlin up in Maine, and they are kept in constant circulation, too. This is one of them: In his early days, at a certain caucus in Hampden, the only attendants were himself and a citizen of very large stature. Mr. Hamlin had some resolutions to pass which began by representing that they were presented to a "large and respectable" gathering of voters. "Hold on," cried the other man, "we can't pass that, for it ain't true! It ain't a large and respectable caucus! There's only two of us." "You keep still, brother!" commanded the wily Hannibal, "it's all right, for you are large and I am respectable. You just keep still." So the resolutions were passed without further demur.

A prominent minister of this city, says the Washington Post, tells an amusing story on himself, and he is not at all loth in joining the laugh which is sure to follow its narration: "I had accepted an invitation to speak at an insane asylum," he says, "and when I made my address to the assembled patients I tried to make it as simple as possible, using only subjects that could be easily grasped by their feeble minds. One of my illustrations treated of the custom of the Indian women have of throwing their babes into the sacred Ganges. During my discourse I noticed a man who had his gaze riveted steadily upon me. His face was a study, and had an appallingly cunning and devilish expression, which annoyed me very much. After I had finished my speech I met the man, and grasping him by the hand, I said that I had noticed he was particularly interested when I spoke about the horrible custom I have referred to. 'I would like to know, my good fellow,' I said, 'what was passing in your mind at the time.' Turning upon me with a savage scowl, he exclaimed: 'I was wondering why your mother didn't throw you in.'"

Daniel O'Connell, the great Irish orator, when taking a ride in the neighborhood of his house, had occasion to ask an urchin to open a gate for him. The little fellow complied with much alacrity, and looked up with such an honest pleasure at having rendered the slight service that O'Connell, by way of saying something—anything—asked: "What's your name, my boy?" "Daniel O'Connell, sir," replied he stoutly. "And who is your father?" demanded the astonished Liberator. "Daniel O'Connell, sir," O'Connell muttered a word or two below his breath and then added aloud: "When I see you again I'll give you a sixpence." Riding briskly on he soon forgot the incident and fell to thinking of graver matters, when, after traveling some miles, he found his path obstructed by some fallen timber, which a boy was stoutly endeavoring to remove. On looking more closely he discovered it to be the same boy he had met in the morning. "What!" cried he, "how do you come to be here now?" "You said, sir, the next time you seen me you'd give me sixpence," said the little fellow, wiping the perspiration from his brow. "Here it is," said Daniel; "you are my son—never a doubt of it."

NOTES.

It is announced that the Republican State campaign will be opened on September 13th, with grand ratification meetings in every county. Doubtless there will be an exception in Sacramento, as the 13th will fall in the midst of the State Fair.

The Board of Trade has "resolooted" again. We will see what force there is in such action. From all outward appearances, there will have to be something more than "resolootin'" to insure the proper consideration of any enterprise that knocks at Sacramento's doors.

Our people are very patient—have been patient for many years. There is a limit to human endurance, and it is not improbable that some of those barnacles on the body politic may realize that fact in a most summary manner. Long suffering makes us desperate and resolute. There is danger in the air.

Mr. J. Lang has always been a very active member of the Sacramento Turn Verein, and on Wednesday night he was complimented with a serenade by that society, after which he was invited to a banquet at Turn Verein Hall, the occasion being the twentieth anniversary of his membership in the society, and also the fiftieth anniversary of his birth.

The modern press can cut a fellow up about as bad as a buzz saw. A prominent local attorney recklessly threw himself between the Board of Trustees and the press, and has realized the fact that it is not any safer to monkey with the press than with a buzz saw. He may not be as handsome since the encounter, but he will have a "d—d slight more sense."

We have known Minister Mizner for many years, and have no doubt of the correctness of his action in the late South American troubles. He is cool, brave, and very deliberate in all his actions. We agree with Congressman McKenna, that it is safe to assume that he did the right thing at the right time. In his dispatches, the Minister does not mention his personal troubles. This is characteristic of the man.

Tom Clarke has commenced a warfare against cigarette pictures, and he swears that they must go. "I have started a boycott against the intolerable nuisance and am rapidly gaining followers. We buy no cigarettes with which come pictures. We all work hard to make converts, and I believe that the gaudy and absolutely senseless cards are doomed to a speedy death." There are many people who will say: "Good! Abolish the cigarette pictures and then the cigarettes." But one at a time.

Now come some of our experts in medical science, and dispel what they term, a delusion. It has always been understood that cucumbers are extremely indigestible. We attribute many qualms of our stomach to the poor inoffensive cucumber, when it is entirely innocent. Cucumbers consist mainly of water and are very digestible. Well, this may be the scientific idea of the succulent plant, but somehow we never indulged our appetite for it, that our stomach did not revolt in the course of a few hours. But if the medicos say that the cucumber is digestible, it must be so, and our experience counts for nothing.

O, wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us!

Had Bobbie Burns in mind the Trustees of Sacramento? Hardly was it possible, yet he wrote aptly. The temper of the people of this city cannot be misunderstood; the Pow'r should be given to two of the members of the Board of Trustees to see themselves as others see them. The feeling now is that at the entrance to Sacramento a yoke has been erected, under which all entering capital is compelled to bend, and that the unloading must be made to the smaller politicians. In the beginning of this year it was openly published that for a price the office of Clerk of the Water Works was sold; the denial has not come. With relation to the granting of franchises, ugly rumors have been circulated. The experiences of the last week doubtless will convince this people that next March they should elect a member of the Board of City Trustees.

Congress might just as well adjourn, now that Tom Clunie has left Washington. There is certainly nothing can be done in his absence, if all the telegraphic accounts of the wonderful prodigies performed by this statesman are as published. Tom has the knack of getting solid with news reporters—for an adequate consideration—which accounts for his alleged prolific Congressional record. Modesty is not an ingredient of Tom's composition. It was managed to associate Tom Clunie's name with everything pertaining to California. The slight fact that he had nothing whatever to do with a matter, made no difference, he was accredited with championing everything. We observe, however, that Congress is still in session and the departure of Tom has not paralyzed the business of the nation to any perceptible degree. It is a strange thing that the project of securing an ordnance foundry at Benicia has not been attributed to Tom.

There is a wonderful interest manifested by the majority of the Board of Trustees regarding the suppression of gambling during the State Fair. To those who understand the true inwardness and motives of the parties who prompt this peculiar action, the affair becomes a roaring farce. The object is plain, that somebody outside of the Board of Trustees desires to levy blackmail, and the means adopted by the Trustees only serve this purpose of the miserable scoundrels who have so long fattened upon the fruits of villiany. The ear marks of the profit of naming deputy constables are very plain, and smacks of the blackmailer very loud. The law makes it not only the duty of all peace officers (not piece officers) to suppress gambling, and it goes further and makes it a criminal offense for any officer not to take note of gambling. Thus these pretended safeguards against gambling are but the outcropping of viler officers.

We have not heretofore spoken of the rights of the American hog in Germany, though we have known the subject has been prominent in the minds of the editors of the frontier press, of Mr. Phelps and Mr. Bismarck. It seems that Mr. Bismarck did not like our American pork, and ordered that it should not be received in his territory. To our mind, Mr. Bismarck knows little of what high living is, else he would equip his larder with "Our Taste" hams and his cellar with Buffalo. We, of course, do not care to bring on a war with Germany about this pork question, and would much dislike if the battle should be fought out with pork and sauerkraut. Should it, however, come to that, we would get out of range of the sauerkraut. One of our daily contemporaries is evidently alarmed, and editorially solves the problem this wise: "The United States by merely putting the screws upon German exportations to America could make it feasible to place a slice of American pork upon every slice of sauerkraut in Wilhelm's dominions within ninety days." That will doubtless settle the whole question. A marked copy of the paper should be sent to Mr. Secretary Blaine.

Very much has been published by humanitarians concerning sea sickness and its avoidance. A very distinguished writer, whom we do not believe ever went to sea on a tug boat, gravely tells us that sea sickness is the result of the lack of moral courage, and that if a man will firmly make up his mind he will not be sick, it will be; sickness will not come. We have never "gone down to the sea," and therefore we have borrowed our introduction. An intelligent reporter of THEMIS yesterday interviewed John Barrett, one of the survivors of the Sacramento adventurers who recently circumnavigated the Farallone Islands in the tug Relief. Mr. Barrett had so far recovered that he was able to be on the streets, but was not in trim to fight, hence the reporter could do about as he pleased. In response to our inquiries Mr. Barrett said: "The man who says that sea sickness can be avoided by the sheer force of the exercise of moral courage does not know what he is talking about. I had heard about that and I tried to keep my thoughts upon other matters than the sea. I concentrated them on the glorious majority the third ward would give for Markham, but when the tug boat would get into a valley in the water, it would go down until we could see the land at the bottom of the sea; then by the force of the water it would raise. I really sympathized with the tug boat, and honestly felt the heaviest weight it had to raise was my stomach. Did you ask me if I was sick? In future I will travel on the electric railway. The sea birds seem to be fond of the Farallones. While I do not admire their taste I am not so ungenerous as to seek to dispose them. Flying is one thing; sailing on a tug boat another. I will venture if the sea gulls that inhabit that island had to get there on the Relief, none would survive the trip."

We publish this week the account written by Dr. Robert Semple, of the Bear Flag revolution. Last week we published his description of the Bear Flag. Since the articles referred to were prepared, the September number of the Century Magazine has come to us. It contains an article on "How California came into the Union," by George Hamlin Fitch. It is in the main correct. Following in the same number are notes under the heading of "Californiana," the first of which is over the signature of Josiah Royce. Mr. Royce, in his article, dwells particularly upon the matter of the acquisition of the territory of California by the United States, and refers somewhat in detail to the conduct of Commodore Sloat. We have read with interest the writings of Professor Royce, the first of which, if we recollect right, appeared in the Overland Monthly of September, 1885, and gave what purported to be an account of the squatter riot in this city. The paper was criticised, and very justly, in that it misrepresented the then condition of affairs here. Afterwards Professor Royce wrote a book entitled "California, from the Conquest in 1846 to the Second Vigilance Committee in San Francisco—A Study of American Character." In that book Professor Royce committed the blunder of misjudging the pioneers of this State. An elaborate criticism of his work was published in the San Francisco Chronicle, on May 25, 1886, and on June 15th of the same year, the Professor saw fit to respond in his own behalf. It can be as well said that the authority of Mr. Royce on matters of early California history is not accepted here. That he has made research is evidenced by his written works; that he has not had the opportunity of meeting and conversing with men who were active participants in the events of the early history of this State is apparent.

State Fair Notes.

The display of mechanical industries at the Fair will form a prominent feature, more so than in years past, as the advantages offered to the merchant and manufacturer to meet consumers are greater than in any other way. It is at exhibitions of this kind that the interior merchant visits to note the progress made in the various industrial pursuits. At the gatherings that are held here each year, a most valuable opportunity is given to become posted in California's productive resources. The exhibits by counties will be very complete.

The applications for stalls at the Park increases yearly. This indicates that the interest taken by breeders is warranted. There is no doubt but that the advantage of exhibiting the different lines of fine stock is remunerative to this class. It is highly essential that exhibitions of this character should be encouraged, as it benefits all productive classes. There being no other channel for official recognition it is of great value in making sales.

While the exhibition is maintained solely for the benefit of producers, the Board of Directors recognize the necessity for additional attractions to amuse the sight-seers.

The great interest now taken in music by the people has stimulated the Board to make provision for this necessary attraction in such a way that it will be one of the features of the exposition. To this end they have contracted with Signor Liberati for his famous military band of fifty pieces, for the entire second week of the fair. This will be the first appearance of the band on the Pacific Coast, fresh from its great successes in the East.

The First Artillery Band has been engaged and will play at the Park daily, and at the Pavilion the first six nights.

A great attraction at the Park will be an expert Vaquero exhibition. Another attraction will be the Ladies' Tournament and the inaugural exhibition of the Amateur Athletic Sports. This will form a very attractive feature, and will consist of games similar to those had at the University of California and Olympic exhibitions. The young men are interested in this—there are now over one hundred individual entries, and it is sure to be successful. Mr. Wm. Greer Harrison, of San Francisco, has been selected as referee, and Capt. Walter A. Scott, as starter and handicapper. The Inspectors of the day will be Wm. Kleinsorge, A. P. Booth and J. M. Mansfield, of the Sacramento Athletic Club. There will be a first and second prize medal in each event, as the P. C. A. A. A. does not permit members to receive money premiums.

Undines Redivivus.

We are glad to note the revival of the Undine Boat Club. Only a few years ago the Undines were the most favored of all local amusement institutions. The membership was of the very highest character of young men, whose entertainments were the social events of the season. But like all things of the kind, interest began to flag, until the personnel of the club disappeared. Now it seems new blood has been infused in the enterprise, and the "old times" may be looked for. This class of sport is to be commended as healthful and invigorating. We suggest that the little sailing yacht of Capt. J. D. Young, W. A. Anderson, James Keegan, O. B. Turrill and Charles H. Holmes be added to the Undine fleet. We are advised that the young men who have taken the management of the club in hand, are in earnest and will leave nothing undone to make the enterprise a permanent success.

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 158. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Nellie McHenry in Lady Peggy drew good houses on Monday and Tuesday nights at the Metropolitan.

Last night Daniel Frohman's production of the Prince and Pauper with Elsie Leslie and Company, drew a good audience at the Metropolitan. To-night the same bill.

Next two weeks Jos R. Grismer and Phoebe Davies, with a strong company, will hold the boards of the Metropolitan. These careful and popular artists should receive the patronage of the amusement loving public. There are no better or more painstaking artists on the stage than Joe Grismer and his accomplished wife, Phoebe Davies. The season commences Monday night, which will include the popular dramas and comedies of the day, among which will be presented, Lights and Shadows, Under A Yoke, The World Against Her, Two Nights in Rome, Beacon Lights, a new romantic drama never before produced in this city. The same may be said of Under the Yoke and Two Nights in Rome. Popular prices, 50 and 75 cents and no extra charge for reserved seats. Crowded houses should be, and doubtless will be the order.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos. *

The Modern Mariner.

The ancient mariner had trouble that he killed an albatross; the modern mariner of Sacramento, it would seem from the experience of the members of the party from here that made the trip to the Farallones and back on the tug Relief, could not have met the sad experience of the mariner of old, in that when they reached the island, if it had become a question of slaying, the albatross would have had the advantage. We have received the following lines from the pen of a young lady, dedicated to that which remains of Frank T. Johnson, the last who survived on the expedition:

Some hayseeds went sailing out into the west,

Out into the west, 'ere the sun went down;
Each thought of himself as the fisher best,
And the people stood watching them out of the town.

For men must fish, even though they weep
At the little they get and the little they keep.

While the tug Relief is rolling.

Some fellows went sailing out into the west,
To the Farallone Islands away from town;
They were citizens of the very best,
And they were stalwart, and rugged, and brown.

For men must fish, even though they weep,
Though nothing they earn, and nothing they keep.

As the wily Pacific is rolling.

A sorrowful crowd sailed back from the west,
Back from the west, when the sun went down;

Each thought of the dear ones who loved him best,

As they journeyed back to 'Frisco town.

Some men can't fish—but they can weep,
At nothing earned—no harvest to reap.

And the ocean still keeps rolling.

These fishers will never go fishing again,
Out into the west from 'Frisco town;
The sickly smile to a frown has changed,
As the people come marching them back to the town.

They feel like weeping—they caught no fish;
The platter is still an empty dish.
And now our hayseed friends are moaning.

A Famous Hymn.

The circumstances under which Cardinal Newman's famous hymn was written are thus described by Dr. Duffield in his book on "English Hymns":

At Leonforte, Sicily, he was very ill with malarial fever. "My servant," he said, "thought I was dying, and begged me for my last directions. I gave them as he wished, but I said: 'I shall not die, for I have not sinned against light—I have not sinned against light!' I have never been able to make out at all what I meant." Later on in the course of the disease, he became much depressed and sobbed bitterly, as invalids often do. His servant, asking what ailed him, could only obtain the reply, "I have a work to do in England." At last he was able to "get off in an orange boat," but was becalmed a full week between Corsica and Sardinia. Here it was that "Lead, Kindly Light," the most famous of all his productions, was written. Its original title was "The Pillar of the Cloud." It was first published in the British Magazine, and then in Lyra Apostolica, 1837, in three stanzas, with the motto, "Unto the godly there ariseth up light in the darkness." Dr. Newman himself states that June 16, 1833, was the date of the composition, on a voyage beginning at Palermo and ending in Marseilles.

LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT.

Lead, kindly light! amid the encircling gloom
Lead thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home;
Lead thou me on;
Keep thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

I was not ever thus, nor prayed that thou Shouldst lead me on;
I loved to choose and see my path; but now,
Lead thou me on!
I loved the garish days, and spite of fears,
Pride ruled my will! Remember not past years!

So long thy power has blest me, sure it still Will lead me on.

O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone.

And with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.
—John Henry Newman.

Doubtful Compliment.

"Do you think your sister likes me, Tommy?"

"Yes. She stood up for you at dinner."
"Stood up for me? Was anybody saying anything against me?"

"No, nothin' much. Father said he thought you were a good deal of an ass; but sis right up and said you wasn't, and told father he ought to know better than judge a man by his looks."

The New California Bank.

The bank department of the new California Bank building is a model for beauty and convenience. The design and workmanship of the rooms comprising the bank quarters are exquisite. We venture the statement that there is not another banking institution in the United States that can excel this for grandeur and practicability. It will well pay any one to visit these splendid rooms and inspect the same. A. Abbott, the cashier of the bank, is entitled to the credit for the design and details. It makes a poor fellow feel as though he would like to have money, just for the pleasure of depositing in such a magnificent place. We feel that way ourselves.

Music and Beer.

"I'll tell you a story, and every word of it is truth. But as I am a newspaper man I don't want my name used."

This was the overture. The following is the story:

"You know —. He had been in Chicago a number of years, and, having some money, he wrote to a friend in another part of the country to come on and do likewise. The friend acted upon the advice. The day he and the Chicagoan met the latter asked the former what he could do.

"I can sing."

"The Chicago man said nothing more at that meeting—that is, nothing more about business. But I know he was set back by his friend's reply. In a few days, however, the two met again, and the Chicago man gave his friend a card. To bring the story down to a quantity that will 'adjustify a column,' the friend got a place as tenor in a church choir in one of the late suburbs. He has been singing there every Sunday, but has been doing nothing else until recently. About two weeks ago he came to town, and during his knock-about he went into a concert-saloon on Rue St. Louis, if you will excuse the combined importation. Several Bohemians were there, and in turn sang 'Die Wacht am Rhein,' 'Annie Laurie Rooney,' 'Larboard Watch,' and so on. Then they asked the newcomer if he would favor them with a song. He filled his glass and began. His voice filled the room, and a hush came over the noisy crowd. In fact, the song was a new one in that place. It was the good old hymn, 'Jesus, Lover of My Soul.'"

"Well, when the young fellow had finished, the crowd in the place hammered on the tables with their beer glasses. It was not altogether for more beer, but it meant approbation of the song and an encore. The young fellow acknowledged the compliment and rose again. Until he began everything was a hush. Then the song, 'Nearer My God to Thee,' was given. When the singer finished there was no applause. Two or three men got up and walked out over the sawdust-covered floor on tip toe, leaving their beer untouched. The man behind the bar thought he felt a fly in his eye, for he struck in that direction with something which he had used for the destruction of the pests on the counter. And he refused to sell a little girl a growler of beer. Some of the boys said afterward that he shoved the hands of the clock around to midnight, so he could close up. I don't know how that was.

"One of the men present is the manager of a cheap place of amusement down town. He waited for the young singer to come out, and said to him:

"If you can sing that way all the time, I'll give you $20 a week to sing ballads at my theater."

"The young fellow said that he had to sing in the church choir on Sundays. The manager said that made no difference; that he could do that and sing in the theater six nights in the week. And the young fellow said it was a go, and he is now earning a good salary out of the two. But it was the church music in the saloon that did it.—Chicago Tribune.

The Prodigal Son.

A prominent judicial light from the South, who had spent several years at Washington as United States Senator from his native State, was in the city not a great while ago and told this story, which is worth repeating. In reconstruction times a couple of local politicians in Tennessee engaged in a debate on the all-absorbing topic. The first one, a white, cited the parable of the prodigal son, and argued that the Southerners should be taken back in similar manner and given all their former privileges. He made a touching speech and seemed to have won his case. However, his opponent, a woolly-haired preacher, quickly took the platform and began his argument. "My 'ponent," he said, "done tole ye about de prodigal son, and say dey should all come back jes like he did. But, my freins, we read dat de prodigal son came and stood a long way off till his fader saw him and ran and hung on his neck and kissed him. But taint so now; here ye have de prodigal walkin' right up into de doors of de capitol and marchin' right in with de's hat on de back of de heads and axin': 'Whah's dat veal?'"

"The Man in the Moon."

The superstition of the man-in-the-moon is one of the most ancient, as well as the most popular and widespread of any of the legions of folk and fairy stories that have been handed down to us from the early ages of the world. Like all other popular traditions, there are many versions of the story which is related to account for the singular appearances which all have noticed on the face of the moon. In England, the United States and Italy, the full moon is supposed to present a well-defined picture of a man leaning on a fork, with his body inclining towards the east (that is when the moon is straight in the south).

The broad light spot to his right, as he stands facing the observer, is supposed to be a burning brush pile, put there with the wretch guilty of the awful deed to remind him of the crime of burning brush on the Sabbath-day. The Bible is supposed to give a key to this superstition. See Numbers xv., 32. In Wales, Scotland, Ireland, Germany and some of the Southern States of our own country the lines and spots on the moon's face are supposed to be a pretty accurate picture of the face of a man, something like the comic faces pictured in the calendars to represent the new moon. The Jews, on account of some story in the Talmud, believe the face to be that of Jacob, the old patriarch. The South Africans speak of "the gorilla-in-the-moon," and always declare that the picture represents a gorilla climbing a mountain, carrying a large club in his hand. The natives of the Amazon River country take the picture to be that of a tapir on a foraging expedition. The long straight line, which the English, the Italians and the people of the United States, take to be a rake, and which the Africans say is the gorilla's staff, is a palm tree with the Amazonians, which the tapir is trying to pull over in order to get at the fruit. In most countries of the Orient the picture is supposed to be that of a lion, which Albutus says "has his head towards the West and his tail towards the East."

In Persia, Siam, Farther India and China, the figure is supposed to be a good representation of two lions engaged in combat. Bishop Wilkins, in his book called "The Moon a Habitable World," says: "As for the forme of the spots on the moon, somme thinke they represent a man, and poets guess that it is the boy, Eudymon, whose company Luna loves so well she take him with her." All these odd superstitions and fancies seem to center on the Biblical passage cited above.

Remarkable Success of the Sex in the State of Massachusetts.

When Harriet Martineau visited America, she astonished Great Britain by writing home "only seven occupations are open to women." Now there are upward of 300 in New York city alone, according to the United States Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. H. G. Wadlin, statistician of the Massachusetts Labor Bureau, in his State report has collected some remarkable facts regarding the industrial condition of the women.

In 1885 the female population of the Bay State was 1,009,257, of whom 300,000 were engaged in twenty-one industries.

There were 18,000 partners or shareholders in various manufacturing concerns. In 1875 there were 1,395 music teachers and 2,065 in 1885; the shopkeepers had increased from 527 to 1,357, the saleswomen from 1,709 to 3,828, the educational teachers from 8,136 to 10,094, the accountants from 1,089 to 27,564, the operators on clothing from 24,345 to 27,564, the operators on cotton goods from 16,554 to 31,521, and the mill hands from 4,000 to 9,150. In the printing and bookbinding firms the increase is from 1,170 to 2,340, in rubber and elastic goods from 364 to 2,147.

In 1875, 30,916 women were furnished with home employment; in 1885 the number had fallen to 18,333, showing that the tendency in all industries is more and more toward factory employment rather than home work.

Twenty-five years ago very few women left home for employment; they bound shoes, made caps, shirts, underwear and children's clothing, hats, baskets, mittens, stockings, carpets and yarn in their kitchens; but all this is changed now. The factories have multiplied, machinery has done away with all hand labor and the women have been compelled to follow the work.

"Woman," Mr. Wadlin says in his report, "has made an entrance into the industrial world, has increased her hold upon old branches of occupation and forced her way into many new ones. She is better educated for active employment, better able to grapple with the difficulties of business than ever before, and, having tasted of the sweets of independence by being able to support herself and help others, one is forced to conclude that woman's position in industry is secure and will be permanent. Every occupation but those calling for too much outdoor exposure or too much muscular labor is open to woman, and if she has not already secured a footing therein the next census will show that she has found a way."

Balloon Ascension.

Prof. Awerkamp will make another of his daring and thrilling jumps from the clouds to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock, at Astoria Park. His ascensions and descents heretofore have been very successful. Should the weather prove favorable, he will make the jump at an altitude of 2,000 feet.

In Greece they have a hard time finding a public executioner. Nine years ago the executioner was a fellow who had been condemned to death for killing his wife; he was pardoned in consideration of hanging the other murderers. Last spring eleven criminals were to be launched into eternity, but nobody could be found to do the launching. Therefore the execution had to be postponed. Finally a wretch (under sentence for poisoning by the wholesale) consented to do the job if his own life was spared. He was conveyed to the place of execution in an iron cage and strongly guarded; otherwise the populace would have torn him in shreds, so violent is the prejudice against the hangman. And after the execution the hangman had to be spirited away on a man-of-war.

Some years ago, when the office of executioner in Paris became vacant, 275 people applied within the space of twenty-four hours for appointment to the post of distinction.

Society has many women who are more in need of a dictionary and grammar than of jeweled hair pins, French shoes and Paris face powder.

THE OLD STORY.

He stops you on the corner, and he gayly spins it o'er;
And you pause and listen, silent, though you've heard it all before.
You remember every syllable, anticipate each pause,
And can point the usual time for interruption and applause.
'Tis to him a thing of beauty, as an everlasting joy;
He finds the entertainment fraught with charms that never cloy.
A tide of things forgotten at its call begins to flow—
That good old joke—that dear old joke—that joke of long ago.

You have heard it in the orchard as you lolled beneath the trees,
Shirking algebra and Latin for the humming of the bees.
You have heard it at the corner, when the day's dull labor's o'er,
The leisure blest assembled at the village general store.
Though each reciter altered it for fear it might grow tame,
It lived in the affection staunch and faithful—still the same.
Ah, one likes to hear him tell it—take his time and tell it slow—
That good old joke—that dear old joke—that joke of long ago.

Honors Were Easy.

A clergyman was once accosted by a doctor, a professed deist, who asked him:
"Do you follow preaching to save souls?"
"Yes."
"Did you ever see a soul?"
"No."
"Did you ever taste a soul?"
"No."
"Did you ever smell a soul?"
"No."
"Did you ever feel a soul?"
"Yes."
"Well," said the doctor, "there are are four of the five senses against you upon the question whether there is a soul."
The clergyman then asked: "Are you a doctor of medicine?"
"Yes."
"Did you ever see a pain?"
"No."
"Did you ever hear a pain?"
"No."
"Did you ever taste a pain?"
"No."
"Did you ever smell a pain?"
"No."
"Did you ever feel a pain?"
"Yes."
"Well, then," said the clergyman, "there are also four of the senses against one upon the question whether there be a pain. And yet, sir, you know that there is a pain and I know that there is a soul."

A celebrated American statesman once said to an intimate friend: "Men give me some credit for genius. All the genius I have lies just in this: When I have a subject in hand I study it profoundly. Day and night it is before me; I explore it in all its bearings. My mind becomes pervaded with it. Then the effort which I make is what people are pleased to call the fruit of genius. It is the fruit of labor and thought." Daniel Webster once said: "If there be such a weight in my words as you represent, it is because I do not allow myself to speak on any subject until I have imbued my mind with it." The law of labor is equally binding on genius and mediocrity.

Valued Reporter—Anything for me to-day?
City Editor Great Daily—Yes. There is much talk in the papers about the scandalous way in which divorces can be obtained on any sort of trumped up charge, without letting the defendant know anything about it. We wish to make a complete expose of this thing.
Valued Reporter—Yes, sir. What am I to do first?
City Editor—Go and get a divorce.
Valued Reporter—Eh! Wha— A divorce from my darling little wife!
City Editor—Oh, don't worry. The paper pays all the expenses.

A man with a red nose and a breath like a distillery got into a street car. Pretty soon a lady got in and sat next to him, having in her hand a bouquet made up largely of peppermint. After awhile the odor of the peppermint aroused the man with the load, and in a half-sleepy tone he muttered: "All right, Jim, another mint julep with you."

The Baby was all Right.

Aunt Mina was the colored nurse. She had brought in the baby who could just sit alone, intending it to be praised and admired as all babies are. Seating it on a cushion, she hung over it with solicitous care and pride, while the lambkin, not having the hinges of its unpracticed back in complete control, pitched north, south, east and west, after a fashion of citizens of its age.

"The baby has lost its center of gravity," said a gentleman at a dinner of unusual merit.

"Wh's dat?" said Aunt Mina resentfully, and then quickly picking the baby up she carried it from the room.

An hour after Aunt Mina came in.

"Wha' dat gemman say dis baby lose, Mis' Sallie?" she inquired.

"He said it lost its center of gravity," was the reply.

"Well, it di'n't lose nufin' of d' kind. I don't want you b'lieve, Mis' Sallie, I lose dem chil'en close. I jes done took dat chile right out an' 'zamed him an' da' was de center of grav'ta right whar I pin it."

No other country on the globe is so determined an advocate of compulsory common-school education as is Prussia. The government there has recently promulgated a new school law which will go into force October of this year. Each and every child is compelled by the law to attend the public schools from the completion of his sixth to the completion of his fourteenth year, and this not for a few consecutive weeks or months, but for the whole year.

A Winged Lizard.

One of the strangest of the many strange creatures that inhabit the wilds of Southern Asia and India is the "flying flower," a small, brilliant-hued lizard of the order brachyolans. On the wing brachyolans resembles a richly tinted insect; when at rest it compares favorably with others of the lizard tribe, with the exception that it has an extraordinary protuberance on both sides of the body. These are the wings, which are formed by a cutaneous flap, wing-like in shape, supported by a series of false ribs. In color these flying lizards are blue and gray, with intermediate tints of various kinds and shades. The tail is long, slender and very snakey in appearance; a large double pouch extending below the head adds to the ferocious aspect of the little rainbow colored brute. The wings are not true wings, strictly so-called, but are used merely as parachutes. When the lizard leaps from the limb of a tree into the air the upper current brings them out and enables the possessor to soar away at an angle to a greater or lesser distance, according to the height of the starting point.

The lizard can change its direction while in the air, a power not possessed by our "flying squirrels." Hence the casual observer might readily believe that they had the power of moving the wing-like appendages, which would, in that case, be true flight. Soaring is, however, the limit of their power, the height of the starting point regulating the distance traveled in the soaring flight, which is quite frequently several hundred yards, an aerial exhibition which strikes terror to the heart of a stranger wandering for the first time in the jungles of the antipodean wilds.

From Sig. Martinez, Concert Solo Pianist.

MR. JOHN F. COOPER.

DEAR SIR:—I can most cheerfully testify to the excellence of your style H solid iron frame Mathushek Company Pianos, (of New Haven, Conn.) Its tone and action I have never seen excelled in any upright piano. I so expressed myself to Miss Mary E. Barnard at her Grand Concert before I saw you. If your Uprights are so fine, what must the Grands be?

Very truly, S. MARTINEZ, Pianist

THICKER AND MORE OF IT.

The following is taken from the New York Musical Courier, one of the largest and most responsible of the leading musical papers of the United States:

"Among the incorporators of the Mathushek & Son concern we find Charles Jacobs as Treasurer, and his brother Albert (we believe that is his name) Secretary, these being the important places in the company. This signifies that Jacob Brothers will 'run' the Mathushek & Son Company, and for no other reason than to trade on the name of the Mathushek Company, of New Haven.

"It is nothing less than an attempt to do with the Mathushek name what Jacob Brothers intended to do with the Lindeman name—a game that was foiled by the Musical Courier.

"Now, let us watch these Mathushek & Son pianos and see if they are not Jacob Brothers' pianos simply stenciled. Editors of the stencil and Kimball music trade press, please call on Jacob Brothers, but don't a'! go at once."—From N. Y. Musical Courier, May 13, 1890.

We copy the above, that the general public may get an insight into the methods adopted by unscrupulous persons in the bogus piano business.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

To-night the Republican campaign in this State will be formally opened in the principal cities, and henceforward, until election day, the people will be entertained by much of politics. In this county the judgment of the local committee was that necessity did not exist for the inauguration of the campaign so early, and particularly that the opening meeting would fall in the midst of the State Fair. The State Central Committee took the same view of the matter. The outlook of the campaign is favorable. The nomination of Colonel Markham is extremely satisfactory. From what we have been able to learn on a recent visit to San Francisco, we are inclined to think Mr. Pond has not the strength his friends anticipated in that city, and certain it is, if our conclusion is correct, founded upon expressions of men qualified to judge of the temper of the people in the interior counties, the friends of Mr. Pond will be much disappointed at the election result. We have heretofore expressed our determination not to make an unmanly or personal fight against him or any other gentleman who has been or may be nominated by parties opposed to the Republicans. We feel that if the Republican party has not enough to commend it from its record and the standing of its candidates, it would be better defeat should come. However it is, the result of the election in Maine a few days ago, that carried with it the return to the House of Representatives Mr. Speaker Reed, is very significant. Men at all acquainted with matters political understand that the majority that gentleman received came, not to him so much personally, as in favor of the principles his party represents. In this State the Democratic party is seriously handicapped. Admittedly its control is in the hands of Mr. Buckley; and while we do not believe his choice primarily of the gubernatorial nominee of the San Jose Convention was Mr. Pond, there is evidence sufficient to convince the people that an understanding had been arrived at between the blind dictator and the candidate. The terms will perhaps never be known, unless it should happen Mr. Pond will be elected, and inference can be drawn from his administrative acts. With the Republicans, there is the advantage that the naming of the State ticket came not from professional politicians—its selections were made by an untrammelled convention. Upon the announcement of the result of the balloting for Governor, Colonel Markham became the choice of all Republicans, and it cannot be said his friends or himself truckled for questionable support, or that his nomination did not come about as the result of an admirable and manly fight. From this county, in the convention, he received comparatively no support, in that the delegates had concentrated upon another. Their candidate was in the minority, but with the other members who gave their support to the gentlemen who were defeated, they, with the constituency they represented, will vie with the earlier supporters of the standard-bearer to present him and those upon our ticket majorities that will be an earnest of our adherence to Republican principles and of our appreciation of the integrity of the gentlemen into whose hands the administration of the State government will soon pass.

There are many people who have an idea that the Hon. T. J. Clunie was very instrumental in securing the Sacramento Postoffice building appropriation. The credit wholly belongs to Hon. Jos. McKenna, and Clunie will not, for himself, claim any credit therefor. When Clunie arrived at Washington, it was the joint wish of the California Republican Congressmen to secure him a place on the Committee on Public Buildings, and the influence and good standing of the Republican delegation accomplished this end. As a matter of fact, Clunie's connection with the Sacramento Postoffice building began and ended with the committee, although a number of letters and telegrams were sent to this Coast to make it appear that Clunie had done everything. The only opportunities that Clunie ever had either for San Jose or Sacramento, were given him by his Republican colleagues, and it became his duty as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings to help all California bills. He is entitled to the credit of bestowing that help, but he was far from giving special favor to Sacramento. As far as the Sacramento Postoffice is concerned, it would have been better if Clunie had not been of that committee, and McKenna could have secured a more prompt recognition of his bill, because Clunie was more deeply interested in the San Jose appropriation, therefore had it reported on the calendar as No. 5, which caused it to be reached in regular order, while he caused the Sacramento bill to be reported No. 35, which prevented it being considered in regular order, and it would not have been a law to-day only for McKenna, who secured from Speaker Reed special recognition to pass it, by reason of his standing among the members. It was the first recognition for a public building of the session. Clunie could never have received that recognition on the floor of the House. Had his San Jose bill been in the same position he could never have secured its passage. There are few who can realize what the passing of a bill appropriating $300,000 by unanimous consent means. It means a good standing in the House—the best of feeling with all the members—a testimony of influence not only on the floor, but with the Speaker. McKenna, by his course in Congress, had secured this friendship, and was thereby enabled to have the Sacramento bill rescued from the position it was placed in by the committee, and passed by a unanimous vote. The records show that Clunie used the whole power of committee—where he had been placed by his Republican colleagues—for the San Jose bill. As a matter of fact, there can be no objection to this, but then there should be no claim in his favor for aiding Sacramento. San Jose is in his Congressional District, and of course he favored the appropriation there first. But as we have said, he was enabled to do this through his Republican colleagues. Clunie's admirers claim for him, what Clunie himself will not have the hardihood to assert to the public. McKenna not only looks after the interests of his constituents, but he has broad gauge views of National questions, which have placed him among the leading statesmen of the House.

The greatest American statesman to-day is Secretary Blaine. Upon all matters of national import he stands forth preëminent. He is in the full vigor of intellectual manhood. It is little wonder that the eyes of the American people are turned towards him with a longing that he may yield to their wishes and become the Chief Magistrate of this nation. We are aware of the fact that the political history discloses that the modern rule has been to nominate and elect Presidents, not among the more exalted statesmen at the time of selection—though some developed into statecraft after election. Some men urge as a decree of Fate against aspirants, that no defeated candidate can be elected by the Republican party, and it is claimed to be against the tenets of the party to nominate a once-defeated aspirant. It is true the Republicans have never nominated a defeated candidate, because it has never been defeated but once, and that at the hands of partisan assassins and through the perfidy of the mugwumps. In this statement we do not consider the contest of John C. Fremont, at the birth of the party, in 1856. There were no mugwumps in New York that year, for that State gave the "Pathfinder" 81,129 majority.

Let us glance at the Presidential succession of this nation and we will find a number of illustrious precedents where defeated aspirants have been subsequently made the choice of the people and elevated to the high station of Chief Magistrate. In 1789 Washington was elected over John Adams. The contest was renewed in 1792, when again Washington triumphed over Adams. The year 1796 was the scene of another contest, wherein John Adams, in his third attempt, reached the goal of his ambition over that great patron saint of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson. At the next election, in 1800, Jefferson was victorious over Aaron Burr, although the electoral vote was a tie, which threw the election into the House of Representatives, resulting in the choice of Jefferson, making Burr Vice President. Again, in 1824, that other great idol of Democracy, Andrew Jackson, was the victim of Fate, although securing 99 electoral votes to 84 for John Quincy Adams, yet the latter was made President by the voice of the House of Representatives. Not daunted by defeat, the old veteran came to the front in 1828, and overwhelmingly triumphed over John Quincy Adams. Jackson ran the third time, and was elected over Henry Clay. Another precedent in favor of Blaine becoming a candidate in 1892, occurs in the contests of 1836 and 1840. The first trial of strength in 1836 resulted in Van Buren's success over Harrison. In 1840, however, the vanquished Harrison became victorious over Van Buren, the electoral vote being 234 to 60. Some political skeptics are wont to compare the fate of Clay with Blaine's aspirations. There is no parallel between these great statesmen on that point. Clay was twice defeated—once by Jackson, in 1832, and again by Polk, in 1844. Blaine's precedents in being once vanquished are illustrious—Adams, Jefferson, Jackson and Harrison. The signs of the times are decidedly in line with our greatest living statesman, James G. Blaine. No man ever had such a hold on the hearts of the American people. There will be no mugwumps in 1892—no political assassins with power to lower the plumes of the valiant knight. It seems to have been decreed by Fate that Blaine shall rule our people as Chief Magistrate.

The Democratic party is one of all manner of expedients. It is at all times inconsistent—possibly consistent only in inconsistency. State and national, it is the same. While crying out as the guardian of constitutional rights, it was a constitutional right to secede in 1860. The history of the party discloses the fact that it has always taken the wrong side of every great national question. During the great rebellion it was for peace, and when the country is at peace it cries out for war against somebody—anybody. When we needed a paper currency to foster the life of the nation, this party demanded specie, and after all was over and there was a demand for resumption to specie, then this party of inconsistencies wanted unlimited greenbacks. It was then for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, but now when we need the free coinage of silver, we find this "defender of the faith" against any of the proposed silver legislation in Congress. In Wisconsin it panders to the vilest means to secure a foreign vote. Indeed it always sought the anarchist and vicious elements to aid it to power. Honor with Democracy is an expedient only. It has at all times depended on the most dangerous classes for its success. When in Congress assembled, legislation is sought to be obtained in the interest of the people and good government, we find the party arrayed as obstructionists. It would defeat prosperity in the interests of its old time cry of States rights. The Federal election measures have been made necessary by the wholesale frauds in Southern States. But the Government even recognizing the States rights doctrine in so far as the States themselves are concerned, does not propose to interfere with their little pastime of carrying State elections in the old original manner, but the supervision and desire for fair play, only applies to Federal elections. Even this is met with the famous Southern refrain, "Unconstitutional." The protective measures for our industries are opposed in the same old spirit. In this State, when the Republicans pointed out the thieving legislation which cost the people over eleven millions, and proposed to reduce taxation to a fifty cent limit, the inconsistency again crops out, by a bid for public favor, even in the face of the damning record, by adopting a platform pledging a reduction to a 45 per cent. limit. There is freshness for you. The outlook for Democracy in the State and Nation is not flattering. It is difficult to make the people believe in its incongruities. The Democrats remind us of a hog going to war. There are few persons who do not know how a hog goes to war. He twists himself around until his body assumes the shape of a boomerang. His bristles are pitched forward and tail tightly curled. The sanguinary tusks are unsheathed, and then resolving himself into a tornado, his hogship charges the enemy sideways. This is about the attitude of the Democracy in this State.

A CHAPTER FOR LITTLE MINDS.

You form a large majority of almost every community, my dear Little Minds, and it is but just and right that you should have a chapter written for you, and only you. There are some truths, common-place and apparently unimportant, yet of which you seem so entirely ignorant that it is but just and right that a philanthropist should endeavor to instruct you. A little careful attention on your part may enable you to comprehend that which, properly applied, may benefit you exceedingly. Your habits induce the belief that you are afflicted with an ignorance that is as unlike bliss as wisdom is unlike folly. You are as anxious to be popular, Little Minds, as if you had a generous and clear-headed comprehension of the advantages to be derived from social or political influence. Life puzzles you. "Some people," you say, "have luck." B— succeeds where nine men out of ten would fail. You do not understand the secret of success, either socially or financially. The "open sesame" to that which you covet has never been whispered to you, and impoverished you stand without the walls containing the treasures of existence. My dear Little Minds, it would be neither just nor merciful to excite fallacious hopes, on your part, concerning that which you may achieve. You can never hope to accomplish anything very wonderful or surprising; but you may find existence much more comfortable than you do find it, if you will but examine into the causes of your discomfort, and take for your counsel a little common sense. In the first place you are ambitious. You desire to appear well; if not to the world at large, at least to your own circle of friends and acquaintances. You are continually striving for effect; constantly endeavoring to perpetrate an originality; tortured by a sense of insignificance, and crushed by the recognition of your neighbors' superiority. You realize that you can neither rival nor excel your neighbor. You do not dare to measure lances with him. His superiority annoys and his triumph maddens you, yet you have neither the wisdom nor the discretion to refrain from proving yourself ill-natured as well as narrow-minded. You malign and endeavor to criticise that to which, in all common decency, you should render homage. You refuse to acknowledge anything praiseworthy in your neighbor, and imagine that, by so doing, you are cheating him out of the honor that is his lawful due. You must confess "that you cannot see anything so very wonderful in his attainments." "You have always thought him shallow, superficial, and pretensions," etc. Now, my misguided Small Minds, your opinion does not weigh anything with the world in its estimate of your neighbor's character. When the occasion comes for a great thing to be done; when the work is offered that is the test of power, your neighbor will prove himself capable of that work, and still do it in such a manner as will shame your envious detraction. You cannot prevent things from seeking their level, and not only seeking, but finding, their level. Wherever your neighbor belongs, there will he be found. The niche in which he fits will be attained. The laws of compensation are immutable and unescapable, and your large-brained, deep hearted neighbor will as surely achieve the success he deserves as you will be visited with the contempt that you spend your insignificant little existence in earning.

Yes, yes, you say to yourselves, in the shallow recesses of your narrow little minds, you know this, and there is no comfort in the thought. You know that you cannot prevent your neighbor from receiving his dues; you realize that he must sit in high places, while you sulk and plod along obscure byways; and you are troubled and exasperated with the conviction. Now, Little Minds, you may escape a vast deal of discomfort by ceasing to malign your neighbor, and by gracefully, and with a generous show of magnanimity, acknowledging that he is your superior. He will shield and tolerate your silliness, for the sake of your amiability; whereas, by hearing of your malicious little remarks concerning his claims, he will spurn you with his foot, or crush you with his heel, as he would a wretched little wasp or malicious young serpent. It is the very height and depth of folly to provoke the wrath of one who is so infinitely your superior as to be able to crush you into nothingness with the magnificence of a scorn beyond your puny comprehension. You cheat yourself, too, sadly in the estimation of others, for, though you may never be considered brilliant, nor intellectual, nor in any manner superior to the generality of the world mentally, yet you may be considered amiable, honest, just, unselfish, and possessed of that most prominent characteristic of greatness, magnanimity.

It will be very difficult for you to be generous; very hard indeed to be silent concerning your own claims, and urgent for the claims of your neighbor; yet, depend upon it, you cannot do a wiser thing for the advancement of your own interest. Since you cannot be great, you can at least counterfeit greatness so as to deceive the majority of people. It is impossible for you to be generous and charitable from large-hearted magnanimity; but, perhaps, if you can understand that it is for the advancement of your own interest to appear self-forgetful, you will counterfeit that which you cannot emulate; and even pretended amiability is better than venomous sincerity. It is better that you should be pleasant-spoken from motives ever so selfish than that you should be a perpetual irritation to your acquaintances by your envious detraction.

There are some indications of greatness that you might learn and imitate, and receive thereby very much more esteem than you now receive. A great mind does not bring forth its own claims, and demand of you, in so many words, that you render unto it that which it deserves. It is modest, unobtrusive, seemingly forgetful of its own superiority. It is not troubled nor troublesome with the petty interest that so afflicts you. It is quiet, self-contained, self-sustained, yet self-forgetful where the happiness of others is concerned. It is not only willing, but eager and anxious, to render honor unto whom honor is due. It understands that to praise another does not detract from its own claims.

You must remember these things, Little Minds! and, since you cannot be generous in your speech from magnanimous motives, appear generous from this consideration; that you can neither add to nor detract from your neighbor, and what you say of him influences not his reputation so much as your own. Whatever you say of him that is malicious, but proves yourselves given to all envy and uncharitableness, and brings upon yourselves the very contempt that you would visit on your neighbor. We pardon much in those who pardon a great deal in us. He that forgiveth much, shall be forgiven much; which is but another rendering of the Scripture, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

One difficulty with you, oh malicious and perverse Little Minds, is, that you fail to consider how insignificant you are; how powerless you are to make or mar a man. Because you envy and hate a man, that is no reason you should hesitate to acknowledge his superiority. You do not raise him one particle by your praise. Pour it upon him as freely as you will, your efforts will be accepted merely as an evidence of your magnanimity, and the envious world will detract from him just as much as if you had spoken differently. You do not elevate him by your generosity; you simply magnify yourself. Perhaps if you will remember this, you can more readily refrain from your malicious remarks concerning him. Superiority will find opposition enough. Nobody ever climbs without an effort. "What is to be will be," and you clear your own skirts by submitting with a show of magnanimity to the inevitable. Remember this, oh troubled, busy, fretful, cross-grained, narrow intellects; and, if it should not be well with you, it will be better than it is.

To condense the foregoing, that is diluted for the feebleness of your understanding, and repeated that it may be more firmly impressed upon you—since you cannot rival greatness, invoke its protection by acknowledging it. Be generous and amiable, and win the world's affection where you fail to command its acknowledgment of more brilliant gifts.

An appeal is made to your selfishness in urging this upon you, for the reason that selfishness is the controlling motive of Little Minds. The argument that it is to your own interest and advancement to act magnanimously is used for the reason that no other argument could influence you.

Furthermore, Little Minds, that cold, repellant air of yours, that you imagine the natural language of aristocratic exclusiveness, is very unbecoming to you, as well as very impolite and indiscreet. It gives you the appearance of having no genuine, ardent friends, as of course you have not. It makes you appear stupid, and selfish, and ungraceful, with no other dignity than the "dignity of dullness." If you cannot be filled with that genial sympathy, and warm, generous impulsiveness, that do so woo and win this heated, hunted, wearied world of ours, do, for your own sake, affect the large-heartedness you cannot feel. Act your role on society's stage, and the audience will applaud, even though you are only acting. Seem to take a genuine, unselfish interest in something or somebody, outside of the four walls you call home, and you will be repaid even as you deserve. To be sure, you will not receive so much for the mere counterfeit of magnanimity as you would for the reality, but you will receive something, and something is better than nothing.

A CAT FLIRTATION.

We see a cat come stealthily rubbing up against a chair leg, the head inclined coquettishly over one shoulder, regarding us with furtively coaxing smile. With a flirt like that, whether maid or matron, there is no occasion for ceremony. You snatch her up on your knee; she pretends to be offended, and to struggle to escape, but she curls herself up with a sensuous purr when you begin tickling the fur that lies just behind the ear, and thenceforth it is all plain sailing. It is very different with a corpulent and sturdy Tom, who, though he may have luxuriated in comfortable quarters all his life, has, nevertheless, had his sad experiences, and seen something of the worst side of human nature. Mischievous boys have heaved half bricks at him, ill-bred and unsympathetic servants have resented his patrician manners, expelling him with ignominy from the lower regions, and sometimes punching his head. Even his master, who is the reverse of a passomaniac, may never have appreciated him according to his merits. No wonder that a cat of that kind should be slightly misanthropic and suspicious. Naturally, he mistrusts a stranger's advances, but, nevertheless, there is something in your voice which sends a quiver through his ears and makes him visibly relax the rigidity of his tail. You and he might pass for a couple of Free Masons meeting in a foreign country and exchanging the first of the mystical signs. The chances are that he may sidle up toward you when you show an unmistakable desire to converse; but possibly he may stand on his dignity, being a self-respecting animal, and force you to dive after him under the tables. He has no thought of eluding you, or he would have made a bolt of it to some impracticable vantage ground long before; and, once in your hands, he resigns himself voluptuously to caressing, sheathing his formidable claws that might strike terror into a bulldog. It may be said that there is nothing surprising in a petted and decently-educated cat behaving civilly to any stranger under his own roof, though civility is one thing and familiarity at first sight is another.—The Saturday Review.

Scraps from Harper's Magazine.

Jock — was General Taylor's chief of artillery at the time. The command was encamped in a forsaken spot where there was nothing to drink better than water. Captain A., consumed with thirst, met Jock, and said: "For Heaven's sake! haven't you anything to drink?"

"Why, yes; come to my tent," said Jock, in that familiar high falsetto of his. A couple of glasses were filled, clinked and emptied.

Lieutenant B. soon caught the cue from Captain A., and went through the same programme. Then Lieutenant C., and Captain D., and so on, till all the staff had "been there," one by one.

"See here, Jock," said Colonel M. that evening, "We have all had a drink with you to-day by turns. Why didn't you come out like a man in the first place, and invite us all to your tent together?"

"Ah, Colonel, don't you see? The way I fixed it I got half my own whiskey."

Some months ago one of America's younger poets was sent South for his health, and to keep him in spirits a fledgling funny man accompanied him. In the course of events a gentleman of color who was willing to accept a fee for trifling services was found, and, much to the indignation of the fledgling humorist, accepted the fee without a word of thanks.

"The ungrateful wretch," said the funny man. "I gave him a dollar, and he never said a word."

"Don't blame him," said the poet; "your generosity took his breath away, and he couldn't thank you." And now the humorist is jealous of the poet.

At the commencement of our Civil war, people generally were very ignorant of the pomp and grandeur of military rank and the meaning of military titles.

When Albert Sidney Johnson was in command at Bowling Green, Kentucky, General Hardee was ordered with his command to that place from Columbus, Kentucky. At that time the bridge over the Tennessee river, at Danville, Tennessee, had not been completed, and the General and his command had to be ferried over the river to the cars on the opposite side. When General Hardee had crossed the river—supposing, of course, that a special car had been provided for himself and his military staff—he accosted a brakeman belonging to the train with the inquiry, "Where shall I and my staff go?"

The brakeman, having no idea who the General was, or what his staff consisted of, after surveying him and his sword for a moment, replied, "You can go into the car there, and you can stick your darned old staff out of the window."

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Bret Harte's Luck of Roaring Camp has been dramatized for the younger Mayo, who will produce it this season.

Gus Williams and John T. Kelly made a great success in their new play, entitled U and I, at the opening of their season in Worcester, Mass.

Emma Abbott has reached America, and so have her many trunks full of new costumes. But the newspapers aren't making the old fuss over her.

Aiden Benedict is so far having a very prosperous season with Fabio Romani, his own dramatization of Miss Corelli's famous novel, "The Vendetta."

Sarah Bernhardt will be with us next winter, and Paris will be deprived of its chief attraction. But there will be more money in Paris when she gets home again.

Mme. Nordica has compromised with her late husband's relatives for a cool hundred thousand dollars. So now the little prima donna can go on her way rejoicing.

Alexander Dumas' famous play, The Clemenceau Case, translated from the original manuscript by William Fleron, will have its first American production at the Standard Theater, New York, Sept. 15.

Mrs. W. J. Florence, whose hair was a lovely canary color when she left America, one year ago, has turned a bright red, after a few weeks' visit to Paris. Mrs. Florence is now living in London.

Mr. S. Turney has written a pretty song, called She's My Darling, which he has published himself. It is similar in movement to Annie Rooney, and will doubtless become popular among the serio-comics.

Miss Mary Howe, the American soprano, who appeared at the Padeloup concerts in Paris and Kroll's Garden, Berlin, will appear in the leading concerts in the principal cities of the United States next season.

The secret of Carmencita's wonderful popularity is let out by a female correspondent, who says that she made her way to celebrity, and what promises to be her fortune, by the "tortuous shiverings of her spine."

A London paper was sentenced to pay $1,000 damages because it said a certain English actor's reception on the stage in this country was "noticeably cool." If the paper had said that the audience "made it warm for him," he would have wanted damages just the same. Some actors are hard to please.

They tell this story of the famous conductor Richter. Once, in London, a noble lady, addicted to music, said her fan upon his arm and sweetly inquired: "Tell me, Doctor, how do you feel after you have conducted that soul-stirring work, Beethoven's choral symphony?" And Dr. Richter is alleged tersely to have replied, "Hungry."

Mr. W. A. Brady, in revising Lester Wallack's old play to fit Bobby Gaylor, has taken a lot of liberties with the piece, but has made it a very great popular go. It was produced in New York on Monday night at the Grand Opera House, under the name of An Irish Arab, and it went with a roar and a cheer from start to finish. Mr. Gaylor himself made a stunning sort of hit in the principal part, a wild Irishman with a lot of singing, dancing and other specialties to perform. This youngster is going to be a tremendous favorite one of these fine days. He has already got a good start, and will undoubtedly accomplish the unusual feat of making money on his first season.—N. Y. Dramatic News.

Book Chat.

I dote on Milton and on Robert Burns;
I love old Marryat, his tales of pelf;
I live on Byron; but my heart most yearns
Toward those sweet things that I have penned myself.

Robert L. Stevenson's letter in defense of Father Damien is considered one of the best literary efforts of his life.

A thousand pounds is offered for a two-volume novel, for competition, by Tit Bits, the popular London weekly.

"It is fate," said the young officer, as he saw the footprints in the sand. "Thru, but ungrammatical," said Major O'Doud. "Ye should have said, 'They are fate.'"

Self-esteem is a potent aid to a successful career nowadays. If a man is perfectly satisfied himself of the value of his work he finds it a much easier task to convince his fellows of his worth.

It is now definitely announced that Calman Levy, of Paris, will publish this fall the first two volumes of Talleyrand's long-deferred memoir. The three remaining volumes will be published before 1892.

A number of the literary women of the country are endeavoring to induce the authorities of New York and Boston to build a patent garbage crematory. Some of these literary women might benefit the reading public by burning their own writings in it.

The favorite novelist of the day among the women of Paris is Paul Bourget, a comparatively new writer. Six years ago he was practically unknown even to the people of the Latin quarter, where he lives, but to-day his slightest act interests all Paris and his books are read with eagerness.

M. Camille Flammarion, the French astronomer, believes that instruments and men will develop in his beloved science which will enable men to "see stars of the seventeenth magnitude scattered over the depth of heaven in a carpet of 818,000,000 and bring the moon within speaking distance."

The identity of the author of "The Anglo-manics" is one of the puzzles that interest people now. The name is kept secret, "not for the sake of piquing curiosity, but because of the high social position occupied by the author," it is said. Even the publishers do not know the author's name, all the business being transacted through a third party.

It is a fine saying of Emerson that the secret of success in life is concentration, not dissipation. The man who peddles out his faculties over a wide surface of miscellaneous activities will exemplify the old saw: "Jack of all trades, good at none." Few men have been more magnificently endowed than Coleridge was. Yet his life was a failure. Why? Because of a divided will. He loved literature, but he also loved opium—exactng mistresses, both. Courting both, he won dust.

Mr. Oscar Wilde thinks "it is a pity that Goethe never had an opportunity of reading 'Dorian Gray'" —the story which he (Mr. W.) recently wrote for an American magazine—and he goes on to "hope that some ghostly publisher is even now distributing shadowy copies [of his novelette] in the Elysian fields." But a moment's reflection ought to be sufficient to crush Mr. Wilde's characteristic aspiration, for it is surely contrary to precedent that those who dwell in Elysium should have inflicted upon them what might appropriately form one of the punishments of Tartarus! The famous apostle of estheticism must content himself with the adulation of his disciples and leave off sighing for ghostly readers.

Victor Hugo has two grandchildren. The girl was a sweet, kind-hearted, and unaffected child, but "hard to manage." She has a gravity of disposition not expected of her. George Hugo, who has just been placed in a state of perpetual tutelage, was the most serious and manageable of the great writer's grandchildren. He is now devoured with fancies. He was brought up in a convent—figuratively speaking—and is not able to protect himself from little habits of spending money and getting in debt. He has great artistic talent. Perhaps if he were allowed to run through his fortune quickly, and obliged to face such difficulties as his noble grandfather overcame, he might yet prove a great artist. But he cannot now contract debts, make large purchases, sign deeds, bring actions in court, or make any covenant of importance save a matrimonial one. His powers are limited to drawing the interest of his share of the estate left by Victor Hugo and to making a will. The child is not always father to the man.

Professional Chat.

Bronson—"Who shall decide when the doctor disagrees?" Johnson—"The Coroner generally has to do it."

"There is only one cure for smoking," said a club man, "and that is death." "That isn't always sure," said the Presbyterian, significantly.

A good story is told of the Rev. Sam Jones. Once, in a crowded assembly, after his sermon, he said: "I want everybody to stand up who wants to go to heaven." Almost everybody stood up, and then he said: "Now, if there is anyone who wants to go to hell, stand up." For a moment no one stood up; then an individual in a back seat arose, and said: "I don't exactly want to go to hell, but I am willing to stand up rather than let the preacher stand alone."

An English doctor did not waste many words with his patients, and positively hated folk who were in the habit of beating about the bush. His consultations were carried on in something after the following style: Enter lady holding up her forefinger. Doctor—"Cut?" Lady—"Bite." Doctor—"Dog?" Lady—"Parrot." Doctor—"Potato poultice." Next day lady returns with her finger in the air. Doctor—"Better?" Lady—"Worse." Doctor—"Bread poultice." The day after—a third consultation. Doctor—"Better?" Lady—"Well." Doctor—"Good morning."

"You'll notice that this long session is not having any apparent effect on Senator Ingalls," said a gentleman from the far West in the Senate gallery, one afternoon, according to the Washington Star. There was nothing in the Senator's appearance to dispute the assertion, so the reporter assented, and the gentleman from the West went on: "I used to know Ingalls years ago. He was thinner then than he is now, and looked just about the same. He lived in Atchison, and had the reputation of being possessed of more brain and less flesh than any one adult in the State of Kansas. One day he went up to the office of a friend of his, a doctor, and while he was in there a newsboy dashed in. Now, the kids who sold papers around Atchison in those days were the noisiest I ever heard, and the doctor's assistant, a cheerful young student, was always on the alert to shut some of them up and to prevent them from invading the privacy of his room with their tramping feet and ear-piercing yells of 'S'n Louay papers!' The assistant had seen this particular boy as he entered the building, and in an instant had placed inside the doorway of the office a full grown skeleton. When the youngster threw the door open, and was midway through one of his declamations the skeleton fell over on him. With a shriek that was worse even than his regular street cry, the boy rolled down one flight of stairs and tumbled into the street, and his murmurings continued right straight along. 'You've scared that boy to his death,' exclaimed the budding Senator, who was overflowing with indignation. Then he went to the window, and bending out, called to the grimy but pallid victim: 'Come back here, boy, I'll buy some of your papers; he shan't hurt you.' The response was instantaneous. The sobs ceased, and he shouted: 'No you don't! You can't fool me, if you have put your clothes on.'"

Mr. Purvis told a good and characteristic story of the late Wendell Phillips, who fought side by side with him during the battle for emancipation. One day he arose to address a meeting that was more than usually hostile to the abolitionists, and had howled down and insulted several previous speakers. Mr. Phillips walked to the front of the platform, and scanning the angry faces in front of him with a keen and fearless eye, began: "You scoundrels!" Instantly there was a storm of angry howls and curses, but when they ceased he repeated in a louder voice, "You scoundrels!" Again the storm arose, and again he repeated the term. The fourth time the American admiration for fearlessness and fair play asserted itself, and the balance of the speech was listened to in silence and respect. Another time, Mr. Phillips was in a railway car, in which were a number of ministers returning from a convention. Among the number was a man with a loud, strident voice, who was loudly declaiming against the abolitionists, and especially against Mr. Phillips. He was talking at every one in the car, and finally shouted that he understood that Mr. Phillips was on board. Calling the conductor, he asked him to point out Mr. Phillips. The conductor indicated the orator, who had been a quiet and interested listener. The little man with the voice strode up the aisle to a disrespectful distance, and after striking an attitude, the following colloquy took place: "So you are Wendell Phillips?" "I am, sir," replied the orator, quietly. "Then why don't you go South and preach your doctrine there?" shouted the little minister. "At that time," explained Mr. Purvis, in relating the incident, "any abolitionist would have been lynched in the South." Replying to the minister, Mr. Phillips asked: "You are a minister of the gospel?" "I am, sir." "Your mission is to save souls from hell!" "It is, sir." "Then why don't you go there, sir."

NOTES.

Spain has a hard time of it between earthquakes and the cholera. She has a visitation of both, the latter to an alarming extent. It would be well for our people here to prepare for this scourge, by doing a little cleaning up.

A pond is always suggestive of mud and slime at the bottom. The Democratic Pond is too close to the corrupting influences to be an exception. We cannot take to stagnant water this fall, when there is so much of the pure article at hand.

The return of Speaker Reed to Congress, by the phenomenal majority, is certainly a pronounced indorsement of his course as Speaker, and a precedent in favor of the legitimate conduct of public business. It is a blistering rebuke to obstructionists. Reed is the "biggest" man of the day, barring Blaine.

The new tariff bill goes into effect October 1, 1890. All goods shipped from foreign ports before August 1st, will have until the first day of November to reach America without being subject to increased duty. Those leaving foreign ports after August 1st, will be subject to duty under the new tariff rates.

The passage of the tariff bill by the vote of every Republican Senator, was indeed a triumph in favor of American industries, and protection to all American institutions. This is a bill to employ many thousand American laborers. It cuts off revenues no longer needed, but it puts new or more effective duties on certain foreign goods imported. The new tariff is expected to insure a larger market for American wool, and therefore a larger demand for labor and American wool-growers.

Bob Ingersoll says Count Tolstoi is a man of genius and a Christian something like Christ. Now when we consider the well known views of the great agnostic, on Christianity, his reference to Tolstoi is anything but complimentary. With Ingersoll's grand ideas of woman and of the love of wife, child, mother, it is strange he could call Tolstoi a man of genius. Perhaps Tolstoi's regard of doctors of divinity, which is so like that of Ingersoll, may account for the doubtful compliment.

In the procession at San Francisco, one of the Parlors had in the line a wagon containing Harvey J. Bee, "a pioneer of 1830, and a guide to the late General Fremont." Fremont did not arrive in California until 1843, having left Washington in May, 1842, on his first exploring expedition. His guide was the famous Kit Carson. In the narratives of his three expeditions, prepared officially, Fremont particularly named the members of his parties, but he does not name Mr. Bee. It looks very much as if the members of Palo Alto Parlor have been imposed upon.

The tariff conference committee to adjust the differences between the Senate and the House, includes the name of Hon. Jos. McKenna, of this district. Such a distinction would not be conferred on any other than a valued legislator. There is no man in the House of Representatives to-day that stands higher as a public man, than Jos. McKenna. Many people think the whole duty of a member of Congress is to secure some special recognition of his district, some appropriation for disbursement in his own locality. This is all well enough, but we like to see men there who can be considered statesmen, and recognized as such. In Jos. McKenna we have a man of this order. McKenna is a pronounced reciprocity advocate, and belongs to the Blaine school. There is other work for a statesman, than securing Federal patronage for individuals, or appropriations for localities. As for appropriations, McKenna has made his district particularly favored in that line.

The majority of the Board of City Trustees expressed themselves on Wednesday at the meeting at which the electric road franchise was granted, as somewhat hurt that their official acts have been severely criticised by the press and the people. In this world a man is judged by the company he keeps, and by the character of those, when in political life, he selects to administer important subordinate public trusts. It happens at this time that one who occupies an important office has neglected his duties to the city to endeavor to secure a gambling privilege during the Fair. Men who confessedly sell themselves at elections have ranked high as candidates for policemen, and it has been openly boasted that matters have been in the past fixed in the courts, in the police office and in public boards—and by individuals whom the people know are not in politics for their health. If the higher officers will discard such associates and appoint men above suspicion—and there are plenty such here—the people will respect and have confidence in them; until such course will be pursued, there will be marked distrust.

The first consignment of Mr. Wanner's large red postoffice street mail boxes arrived Thursday and were located on J and K streets. So far as we have been able to learn, it is the design of the postoffice department to lease the lower stories to the street railroad company for waiting rooms. The design is wise, as people will have an opportunity to be seated while waiting for cars. While the new boxes are not ornamental, they may become useful. Should an attic be added, they could be utilized for poles for the new electric street cars.

A learned physician, in writing of some of the popular errors regarding health, claims that good habits, long persisted in, may and do become bad habits. While this seems paradoxical, it becomes clear when we reflect that any routine in habit tends to the over use of certain organs, and to a corresponding lack of the use of others; so that, on the one hand, the former become liable to diseases of over-excitability, while the latter are rendered liable to those of torpidity. Thus even good habits may become productive of disease. We must therefore be admonished that some "redeeming vice" is necessary to a perfect existence.

Did you ever see a woman with a little pinched-up, withered scrap of a nose that wasn't either a vixen or a fool? Did you ever see a man with a big nose who wasn't a good comrade? Did you ever see a woman with a Roman nose who couldn't hold her own with anything created, from a hotel clerk and a royal babe selling theater tickets behind a window, to a king on his throne or a tiger in a jungle? The dignity of a Roman nose will carry a tourist into the Pullman car where the "wealthy and influential" porter holds his court and compels service and obsequious attention. It will force itself upon the notice of an indifferent policeman at a street crossing, and compel him to clear the way for its owner's triumphant advance.

It will break in upon the dreams of the backman and force him to open ventilators, and make himself useful as well as ornamental. Oh, the fates may have granted you beauty, wealth, grace and wit, an amiable disposition and talent of no uncertain order, but if they have withheld from you the gift of a Roman nose do not call yourself the child of good fortune and do not hope to make much headway in a big and busy world.

A telegraphic report from New York, dated Thursday, gives the following information of interest: All the speculative markets to-day were excited and uneasy, and fluctuations more violent than for many years. In the grain markets fluctuations were wild, and prices went up with a rush. The brokers were all amazed at the character of the Government crop report, it being the most unfavorable, taking all crops together, ever issued, and the shorts and different operators rushed to corn without regard to price. In the Stock Exchange the holders of stock were staggered at the estimates of the crops. The idea prevails that such a falling off in the yield will have a disastrous effect on the net earnings of the railroads. The crop report was soon lost sight of, however, in the alarm caused by several of the most conservative houses calling in their loans on stock collateral. The rate for call loans at once advanced to a premium of 18 per cent in addition to legal interest, and on some of the fancy stocks no loans could be obtained at any figure. This forced a renewal of the attempts to liquidate, and a decline followed. Everything on the list suffered losses ranging from 1 to 6 1/2 per cent, and for a time the market was demoralized. The heavy offers of Government bonds for prepayment of interest then gave a fresh supply of money, and to some extent restored confidence, and in the better class of stocks most of the dealers recovered.

Political.

Under the auspices of the Republican State Central Committee, the campaign will be formally opened to-night, and among the speakers are Hon. Jud. C. Bresie, of this city, who will address the meeting at San Jose. Hon. Elwood Bruener will speak at Salinas. General A. L. Hart will address the meeting at Fresno. As we stated last week, it was deemed expedient not to hold a meeting in Sacramento on account of the State Fair.

The State Fair.

The annual exposition of the State Agricultural Society, now being held in this city, promises to be the most successful ever held in the State. The immense Pavilion is filled, while the stock display at the Park eclipses any of the past. The management deserve credit for their work—and much hard work has been quietly done. The attendance in the early part of this week was of course much diminished on account of the San Francisco celebration, but the people came in later, and the outlook is that next week there will be a crowd.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Grismer-Davies Company has done a good business this week. The engagement has given us three plays new to Sacramento. Lights and Shadows, Under a Yoke and Two Nights in Rome. The last is a very strong play, and has some impressive dramatic situations. Under a Yoke is above the average as a comedy. Lights and Shadows is a melodrama that would suit the most ardent gallery god. During the performance Wednesday evening of Two Nights in Rome, "Evelyn Aubrey" (Phoebe Davies) indulged in some apropos irony towards that unfortunate canvas that answers for a drop curtain. In the scene between "Peabody" and herself, at "Gerald's" studio, when her expectations have been aroused as to the picture she contemplated purchasing, she remarks, "It must be a regular Peri standing at the gates of Paradise," at the same time bestowing a pleasant smile on the audience. The Peri standing at the gates of Paradise, as portrayed on the drop curtain, is indeed a "remarkable" picture.

With a couple of exceptions, Mr. Grismer has a fine company to support himself and artistic wife. Grismer has always been exceedingly successful in presenting new plays and novelties, and the present engagement is the most pronounced in this effort to please the public. The Grismer-Davies combination will hold the boards of the Metropolitan all next week.

The Anniversary Celebration.

The celebration of the Fortieth Anniversary of the admission of California into the Union, that was held in San Francisco this week, was the grandest affair held upon the coast, and few there have been in the more populous Eastern States, that have been more numerously attended or that have attracted more general attention. So many visited that the great city by the sea could hardly afford accommodations, and with many of the strangers the meager accommodations that could be secured were accepted without complaint. True it was the details of the management for the accommodation and comfort of this immense influx of visitors, were in some particulars ily attended to. That matter, however, was due to the incompetency of some who had minor charges, and is always to be expected where matters of such magnitude are to be carried on. Concerning the general management we did not hear adverse criticism. The hotels did the best that could have been done in the matter of furnishing accommodations, and when all the rooms had been taken cots were provided for the later comers. So far as numbers of participants and attractions were concerned, the procession on the 9th was far ahead of anything heretofore witnessed on this coast. There were a few, however, in San Francisco who, apparently, wanted to make the most of it in a cheap John way, such as by the sale of temporary seats and the rental of windows at rates so exorbitant that they did not, in a large measure, command patronage.

There was a feature intruded into the celebration that has very generally been regarded as indecent. Some months ago, a San Francisco paper, in anticipation of the celebration, inaugurated the worn out fake of receiving ballots from whatever Tom, Dick or Harry might purchase a copy of its issue, upon the proposition of determining who is the most popular Native Son in the State. The ridiculous farce is still kept up, notwithstanding it was very properly denounced by the Grand Officers of the Native Sons. These gentlemen felt that an occasion of such importance, and one so intimately connected with their order should not be made an excuse for the peddling out of papers at five cents a copy, or perhaps less if purchased in job lots. Such an unwarranted intrusion would not be for a moment countenanced by the older orders, and it is a matter of regret that some members of the Native Sons so far belittled themselves as to urge their friends to enter them in a contest of this character. At the ending it will mean nothing, and it seems hardly possible that a man of self respect, and who has respect for an order to which he belongs, will place himself in a position to incur ridicule by accepting a badge that will characterize him, so long as he will wear it, as an egotistical ass. It is gratifying that of the thousands who belong to the Native Sons, so few have shown a disposition to be suckers to aid in the sale of a sensational newspaper, and to be instruments to cast ridicule upon an order whose general membership and principles command the respect of the nation.

While upon this subject of cheap news, paper advertising, we can as well speak of a more insignificant borrowing of the same scheme that has been inaugurated to sell copies of a local journal during the State Fair now pending. A lady artist painted the picture of a naked woman standing on tip-toe upon a floating globe. It is entitled "Morning," presumptively from the fact that she arose early and forgot to dress. Such paintings—possibly not so well executed, hang upon the walls of resorts frequented by men only. The directory of the society questioned the propriety of hanging the painting in an exposition building expected to be visited by ladies and gentlemen from this city and abroad, and hence it was given no place. This circumstance has been seized upon by the Bee to get up a little side show of an election as to whether the painting shall be displayed, and the proposition is that anyone who will pay a nickel for a paper, will have the privilege of expressions upon the decency or indecency of the picture. It will strike very many that the question of the propriety or impropriety of exhibits that should be presented to a refined populace should be determined by the directory appointed by the government to control, and if it has come to be that such matters will be dependent upon the sale of a few newspapers and the subservience of private mercenary interests, the people of Sacramento had better ask that the State Fair be removed to some other locality, where it will be conducted with dignity from its management and respect to its patrons. The journal spoken of has illustrated its election proclamation with an outline zincotype, representing as nearly as it can be made out, a woman standing, yet apparently asleep. Perhaps it is not for us to suggest; but another painting entitled, "Still Life," hangs on the wall, and our special artist has faithfully reproduced it in the subjoined cut. What is the matter with our enterprising contemporary selling a few copies of its papers by opening an election during the Fair to have the populace determine which of the lot is the stillest. The contest would be interesting, and would decide a very important public question.

Coming to the Front.

Nevada City has come into prominence this year as a Bartlett pear producing place. Gregory & Co. of Sacramento have bought about $2,000 worth in and about that place, and other firms have purchased about the same amount. It is estimated that the pear crop there will amount to about $10,000.—Colfax Sentinel.

Sack.

Sack is generally supposed to have been sherry, but in truth it seems to have been applied to a variety of wines and drinks. The "good sherris sack" of Falstaff, in which the worthy knight found a "two-fold operation," as well as proof of the roguery of villainous man, when he discovered lime in his favorite cup, was probably the wine of Xeres. Yet it is surprising that the knight could have drank so much as two gallons of this liquor—even more, for there was "sack after supper"—as evidenced in the famous tavern bill, which included the charge of one halfpenny for bread. Two gallons is equal to about one dozen bottles, and not even the four-bottle men of the Regency could have compassed such a big drink as that.

Minsheu's Spanish Dictionary describes Xeres as an Andalusian wine, made near Cadiz, of which the English name is "Xeres Sack." And the commentators of Shakespeare usually take for granted that Falstaff's drink was sherry. But none of them seems to have considered how physically impossible it was for one single individual to have consumed the quantity of sherry charged to Falstaff, if his sack was anything like our modern sherry.

This is the two-fold operation he claimed for his beloved drink: "It ascends me into the brain; dries me there all the foolish, and dull, and cruddy vapors which environ it; makes it apprehensive, quick, forgetive, full of nimble, fiery and delectable shapes; which, delivered o'er to the voice which is the birth, becomes excellent wit. The second property of your excellent sherris is the warming of the blood; which before cold and settled, left the liver white and pale, which is the badge of pusillanimity and cowardice; but the sherris warms it, and makes it course from the inward to the parts extreme." And so on, ending with the denunciation of "thin potations," and the commending of very one to addict themselves to good, ferle sherris sack.

There is no accounting for the tastes of those who drink for the sake of drinking; but Falstaff was not a sot of that description. He drank for good cheer, not to make himself drunk. And sherry, such as is now known, consumed in the quantities which he commended, would have precisely the opposite effect on the liver; in fact, sherry drinking is generally believed to be exceedingly bad for the liver. With all respect, then, to Shakespeare and his commentators, we are unable to believe that Falstaff could, or would, or did consume at and after supper a dozen and a half of wine such as is now sold under the name of sherry.

That sack was a Spanish wine is proved by many evidences. Thus, in the "Ordinances of the Household of King James the First," published by the Society of Antiquaries, there is a distinct reference to "Spanish wines called Sacke." Drake says it was sweet, but of different kinds. If a sweet wine, then we can understand Wycherley's simile, "Wine and women, good apart, together are as nauseous as sack and sugar."—All the Year Round.

As to Feminine Independence.

It is safe to say that feminine independence has been achieved. In this country woman is at liberty to do anything she can do, and the conditions for doing everything are becoming more and more favorable to her.

Female physicians and lawyers are no longer curiosities. We have female farmers, stock breeders, and mining engineers, saleswomen, bookkeepers, type writers, printers, barbers, preachers, and dentists. Recently a pretty, handsomely dressed little woman in Boston, passed a fine examination in the intricacies of port and starboard, cross signals, rules of the road, etc., and was given a special license as pilot of the good steam yacht Isis. The blank filled out by the United States Surveyor gives the following description of Mrs. Poole, the first woman ever licensed by the Board of Steam-vessel Inspectors on the New England coast: "Name of pilot, Eliza E. Poole; age, 28 years; nativity, Massachusetts; complexion, light; height, 5 feet 2 3/4 inches; color of eyes, blue; color of hair, brown."

Women as journalists are generally painstaking, accurate and conscientious. Foster Coates writes that he has found that women do certain kinds of newspaper work more satisfactorily than men can. Women make splendid type setters, good proof readers, good reporters and fair editors.

A Chicago reporter was horrified the other day, during the strike among the brickmakers of the city, to find some women making brick on Ashland avenue above Diversey avenue. He told of his thrilling discovery to some brickmakers at another point.

"Bah!" said they, "that's nothing. If you will take the trouble to look around, especially in the yards out beyond Western avenue, you will see hundreds of women and children doing the same thing every day. They get 12 cents a thousand bricks for hacking. You will probably find their men-folk at home rushing the growler or at some saloon drinking home, talking strike, and damning the country."

But the question of her success and fitness for these activities, and even the necessity for her entering them, is not the only consideration. With free entrance to all callings, come responsibilities on the part of the woman and corresponding release from responsibilities on the part of the man. Because women enter into competition with men on equal terms in all employments, there is no moral cause for men to be released from obligation to support their wives; but what is the tendency?

The change in the relation of the sexes has hardly a healthful tendency. Women are fitted by nature for the proper training of youth for good citizenship and to promote the morals of society, or the stability and welfare of the State. They should have time and opportunity for these functions of overwhelming importance, and they best realize the truth of this saying.

The End of a Thief Catcher.

In 1827 Vidocq was considered to have earned his pardon. He had made sufficient money for his wants, and he resigned.

But the vicissitudes of faith were still before him. He started, with his little fortune, a card and paper factory at St. Maude, in which all the workmen were old criminals. But his capital ran short; the neighbors grumbled at his colony of rogues among them, and the business had to be wound up. He then set up at Paris a secret information office, which was, at first, a great success. But before long he was charged with wringing money from the fears of those whose secrets he acquired. He was arrested, tried, and though at last acquitted, was brought down to the verge of ruin.

He then resolved to try his fortune as a public entertainer. In 1845 he crossed to London, and produced his exhibition at the Cosmorama. His exploits were on every tongue, and thousands of spectators flocked into his show. Vidocq, at seventy, was a striking figure. No spectator could forget the tall form, now grown portly, in drab breeches, white silk stockings, and shoes with silver buckles, the bull-neck, the strange face, sloping upward like a pear, the ears pierced with slender golden rings, the grizzled hair, and the bushy brows above the steel-gray eyes which glittered like a lynx's. His performance must have been immensely entertaining. He told the story of his life; he donned his chains, galley dress, and the huge iron balls which he had worn at Brest; he brought forth relics of great malefactors—Fieschi's coat, Paparonie's cap, the crucifix which Raoul had used in his last cell; he related his escapes and his most famous captures—and as he told his stories he changed his face and decked himself in the disguise which he had worn on each occasion, and appeared successively before the eyes of the spectators as a pickpocket; a coalheaver, a galley slave, a Jew, a scullion, and a nun.

By this performance Vidocq cleared enough to buy himself a small annuity. He retired to Paris and there lived quietly in lodgings until 1857, when, at the great age of eighty-two, he was struck down with paralysis. On finding his end near he sent for a confessor, and—so whimsical a thing is human nature—he greatly edified the holy man by dying like a saint. One trifling peccadillo he perhaps forgot to mention. The breath had scarcely left his body when ten lovely damsels, each provided with a copy of his will which left her all his property, arrived upon the scene. Alas for all ten! Vidocq had always loved the smiles of beauty, and had obtained them by a gift which cost him nothing. He had left his whole possessions to his landlady.—Temple Bar.

The Origin of Alphabets.

Those who are obliged to read the handwriting of a number of correspondents are aware how large a proportion of educated men write more or less illegibly, and that, except in cases of imperfect sight or of an unsteady hand, this want of clearness is mainly due to hurry. The writer sketches the general effect of a word so as to give himself the least trouble in conveying its meaning, and omits all strokes, dots and stops which he thinks not to be absolutely required. Nor is this only to be observed in civilized Europe, for the handwriting of Orientals, who use the varieties of the Arabic alphabet, is equally rendered illegible by the same causes.

It is in the recognition of this desire to save labor that the underlying principle to be followed in tracing the growth of all epigraphic systems is to be found, not even excepting the most cumbersome and laborious of existing methods—the Chinese; and the knowledge of this principle has enabled scholars to place on a secure basis the study of ancient modes of writing. The crude attempts made a century ago by those who had not at their command the wealth of epigraphic evidence which has now been gathered, who regarded the square Hebrew of their own times as an original character already existing in the days of Moses, who saw no objection to attributing the early Christian "Sinaitic Inscriptions" to the Israelites or the coins of the Hasmoneans to the Kings of Judah, have now been superseded by a sounder study of facts, and the recovery by De Sarzec of very early Babylonian texts on the statues of Tell Lo, and that of yet more archaic inscriptions in Syria and Asia Minor and Cyprus, has rendered it possible to trace with certainty the progress of the art of writing.

From the hurried scrawl of a modern Arabic epistle to the carefully engraved letters of the Moabite Stone is a transition so complete, that if we were not possessed of the intermediate steps represented by the Nabathean and the Cufic, we should never be able to feel satisfied that the Arabic alphabet is a direct lineal descendant of the Phœnician. Yet not only is this the case, but the history of the Phœnician letter itself can be carried back from the ninth century B. C. for a length of time equal to that which divides our own days from those of Solomon; and the well-defined form of the Moabite symbols is found also to result from a continual and very gradual change, which has produced a conventional shape from what was originally the carved figure of a natural object. It has been proved over and over again, by independent scholars working at different systems of writing—such as the Chinese, the Cuneiform or the Egyptian—that no people ever invented an arbitrary system of writing, or ever originated an alphabet as such by any mutual assent. All the known graphic systems originate in a picture-writing as rude as that of the American Indian or of the South African bushman.—The Edinburgh Review.

The exhibition of John F. Cooper, at the State Fair this year, is the largest ever made at any Fair in this State. Yet it is only a mere trifle in comparison to the splendid stock he has in store. In his ware-rooms, Seventh, I & J streets, can be found the largest, finest and best stock of first class pianos, organs and all kinds of musical goods. His stock of sheet music, including all the latest and popular ballads, is unsurpassed on the Coast. It is a notable fact that there are more Mathushek pianos sold than of all other makes put together. As an evidence of this fact the freight department of the S. P. Railroad Company can be consulted. Mr. Cooper makes no claims he cannot substantiate. We are glad to announce his great success as a merchant, and his great sales of Mathushek pianos speak loudly in favor of prosperous times. It is to be noted that much of Mr. Cooper's music which he sells for 10c. at his music store, others often ask 50 and 75 cents for the same. It will pay any one who desires to purchase music to secure a catalogue, which can be had at our ware-rooms, corner 7th and J streets.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos. *

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street. *

Stranger—“In excluding from your columns, sir, everything of a sensational nature, or that which cannot be read by every member of the household without bringing the mantling blush of shame, you set an example, sir, to the newspapers of this country that cannot but bear fruit, and—”

Country Editor—“Well, about that advertisement you were—”

Stranger—“The mission of your journal, sir, is a noble one. ‘Upward and onward’ is a glorious sentiment. In putting aside all sordid thoughts of gain and battling for truth and justice alone, you elevate your paper, sir, to the highest realms of journalism, and—”

Country Editor—“About how much space will your advertisement occupy?”

Stranger—“Well, I am not quite prepared to say this morning. I happened to be passing through your beautiful little town, and I thought I would step in and get your rates. If you will kindly state in your next issue that Mr. Obadiah R. Tomlinson, a prominent citizen of Cityhurst, spent a few hours in town last week and made us a pleasant call, and send me a marked copy of the paper, I will be very much obliged to you, sir. Good morning.—Til Bits.”

The Edinburgh Review says: On the other side of the Atlantic it is no new thing for a young woman to come before the world, to cut out for herself a successful and honorable career, and to suffice all other considerations to the development of her individuality. In America there is no aristocracy but that of wealth; no one inherits distinction, it must be won; and a passionate wish naturally arises to make one's mark in one's own day and generation. As a rule the tendency is toward an artistic or professional career, but of late years it has set toward fashion.

So if the French soldier's knapsack carries the legendary baton, the trunk of the American girl contains the possible blue ribbon of the turf, to be won by her in the race for fashionable distinction. And her ambition meets with sympathy. For when the professional beauty, after due study of the “Almanach de Gotha” and of the “British Peerage,” leaves her home, her conquests are applauded not only by her family, but by whole cities, townships and States, who have watched her preliminary conquests, and who invest not a little of their vanity in her triumphs. The more sober and valuable achievements of American women, as sculptors, singers, artists, actresses, lecturers and doctors, are of world-wide renown; for if America has produced Charlotte Cushman, Harriet Hosmer, Mary Anderson and Marie Van Zandt, society in both hemispheres has fallen down and worshipped them.

Mr. Prudhomme and his little boy pass an automatic sweetmeat-delivering apparatus. The urchin dropped in a penny on the sly.

“What!” exclaimed the stern parent, “to think of wasting your pocket money on sweets!”

“Papa, it was a bad penny!”

“Indeed? Well, that's another thing.”

Cashley—“It is perfectly astonishing to me that young women, ordinarily modest, can so distort themselves at the bathing resorts.”

Dashley—“Oh, it's all right since the Czar's emancipation in Russia.”

Cashley—“What's that got to do with it?”

Dashley—“Freedom of the surf, you see.”

A Berlin merchant was a daily customer in a noted restaurant, and always honored the waiter generously, as he liked him for his attentiveness. One day another waiter served him. He was much surprised. “Where is Fritz?” “He is here,” said the new waiter, “but he can't serve you. You see,” he continued, “we played poker the other evening, and after Fritz had lost all his money he put up his customers, and I had the good fortune to win you. Another beer.”

A magnificent sword of the fifteenth century is shortly to be placed in the Louvre Museum in Paris. It is ornamented with graceful designs from the hand of the great sword maker, Hercules de Pesaro, who did the work for the Bargas, the Ganzagas and the house of Este, and is thought to have belonged to Francisco de Ganzago, who commanded the Italian army crushed by Charles VIII, in 1495.

mento—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.
The People of the State of California: to JOHN M.
RICHARD, Greeting:
You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff
and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony
now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service,
if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July,
A. D. 1890.

The People of the State of California,
To NICHOLAS MAKREE, Greeting:
You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 2d day of July, 1890, in which action Celia Makree is plaintiff, and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony
now and heretofore existing between you and said plaintiff, on the ground of wilful desertion, and for the care, custody and control of minor children of you and said plaintiff, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days;
exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere,
and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in her complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of July, A. D.
1890.

The People of the State of California, to J. H. Coghill and A. J. Coghill, greeting:
You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the second day of August, 1890, in which action John Ruedy is plaintiff and you are defendants. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, quieting title of plaintiff to the south 110 feet of Lot No. 5, and the south 110 feet of the east quarter of Lot 6, block bounded by D and E, and 6th and 7th Streets, in the City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, State of California, and directing defendants to appear and set forth their title, if any they have to said premises, and that defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim thereto, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint
within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere;
and you are further notified that unless you so
appear and answer within the time above specified,
the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of August,
A. D., 1890.

Attorney for Plaintiff. aug16-9t.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY
of Sacramento, and State of California. In the matter of the estate of John Kohler, deceased.
It appearing to the Court from the petition this day filed and presented by John H. Sawyer, the executor of the estate of John Kohler, deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate belonging to said estate, to pay the debts, expenses and charges of administration:
It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate appear before the said Superior Court, in Department Two, thereof, on Friday, the 19th day of September, A. D., 1890, at 10 o'clock, A. M., on said day, at the Court-room of said Court, in the Court-house in said City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said executor to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased as shall be necessary.
And that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THEMIS, a newspaper printed and published in said county.
Dated August 15, 1890.

The Wife Succeeded.

A young lady in the neighborhood of Stuttgart who had quarreled with her husband took it into her head to send him a telegram to the effect that she had suddenly died at Stuttgart. The husband hurried off to the town in the greatest alarm, and, with the help of the police, made diligent search for the body of his wife, while she was trudging merrily homeward. In the evening, when the husband returned to his house in the country, after a long and fruitless search and his heart heavy with despair, he found his wife in her usual health and spirits, and a speedy reconciliation was effected. The telegraphic lesson did the husband a lot of good. Still the wife is not happy, for every time she shows herself out of doors the school children call after her: "There comes the corpse!"—Karlsruher Nachrichten.

Next to the woman who wears a low necked dress, I think I despise the woman who carries a dog. My dear, these women will be the death of me yet! I cannot endure them. If I could, without causing remark, whenever I met a woman carrying a dog I should shake her with all my strength. Carrying a dog! when you haven't ambition or force enough to make your own bed. Carrying a dog! when the world is full of orphan babies, when children are being beaten to death by human fiends every day. Carrying a dog! when there is not an hour in the day but some mother is laying away out of her arms her beautiful first born, and mourning to think how lonely her darling must be even in heaven without her. Make and enforce a law that to carry a dog is a finable offense, Mr. Mayor, and I will swing my hat for you next election day.

WHICH WILL IT BE?

Which is the fairest, a rose or a lily?
Which is the sweetest, a peach or a pear?
Merry's coquetish, and charming is Milly;
Dora is gentle and fair. [her.
Sweet as a flower was her face when I kissed

Milly, my playmate, I love "like a sister,"
But Dora I choose for my wife.

That is right, young man, marry the girl you love, by all means, if she will have you. Should her health become delicate and her beauty fade after marriage, remember that this is usually due to functional disturbances, weaknesses, irregularities, or painful disorders peculiar to her sex, in the cure of which Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or money refunded. See the printed certificate of guarantee on bottle-wrapper.

For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequalled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic, or strength-giver.

We have heard of the lady of rare beauty who said, upon a certain occasion, that the only real, disinterested compliment she ever received was from a coal heaver, who asked her permission to light his pipe in the gleaming of her eyes. Another compliment, true and genuine, according to a good old school story, was paid by a sailor who was sent by a captain to carry a letter to the lady of his love. The sailor having delivered his missive, stood gazing in silent admiration upon the face of the lady, for she was very beautiful. "Well, my good man," says she, "for what do you wait? There is no answer to be returned." "Lady," the sailor returned with humble deference. "I would like to know your name." "Did you not see it on this letter?" "Pardon, lady—I never learned to read. Mine has been a hard, rough life." "And for what reason, my good man, would you know my name?" "Because," answered the old tar, looking honestly up, "in a storm at sea, with danger of death afore me, I would like to call the name of the brightest thing I'd ever seen in my life. There'd be sunshine in it, even in the thick darkness."

The news comes from St. Petersburg of the centenary celebration of the 1st regiment of the guard—the regiment raised by the Czar Paul. The men of the regiment had to be the tallest that could be found in the empire, but it was incumbent also that only flat nosed men should be enlisted into this favored corps, in order to accommodate the peculiar head piece which they wear. The conditions are, as far as possible, maintained to this day.

The sacred writings tell us that Solomon was immensely rich; that silver was abundant in Jerusalem; and that in one year the King received from Hiram 300 talents of gold, equal to $16,250,000. It is known that in Assyria there were large masses of gold, and that Darius received in tribute from Persia as much as $16,250,000. In Greece, the wealth of Croesus was estimated at $15,000,000, and that of Pytheus at as large a sum. At Rome, Tiberius, it is said, left a legacy of $10,000,000, and Augustus obtained by testamentary dispositions as much as $160,000,000.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.

A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

It is one of the strange things in literature, that dramatic and fiction writers have such a woeful ignorance of law and Court procedure. The travesties which authors and actors perpetrate in the name of Court scenes and legal ethics are astounding, in the light of the facilities for accurate information through the medium of our many Courts and thousands of talented lawyers. It is rare, indeed, in any drama where a Court scene is portrayed, or where a lawyer is introduced, that the one does not become a silly exaggeration, and the other a pitiful libel on the noble profession. There is no possible reason for such presentations. The realities of many Court scenes abound with great sensations and grand emotions, startling, thrilling, exciting in the extreme. The offices of many prominent attorneys at times furnish material for genuine sensational and emotional characters—for drama and comedy. Only a few weeks ago one of the greatest dramatic companies in the world played here, and introduced a Court scene that was absolutely ridiculous at the hands of such eminent artists. We refer to the Palmer Company in Aunt Jack. It was positively painful to witness that splendid actor Stoddart making a clown's part of a Judge, and the buffoonry of attorneys. About the only play we call to mind, where a lawyer was portrayed in anything like a realistic character, was the old family lawyer in Young Mrs. Winthrop.

Some hasty and inconsiderate writers have erroneously declared that Shakespeare's knowledge of the sciences and the law was sound. While at one time a student of law, the Bard of Avon, his pictures of Court scenes are open to the criticism of the modern drama in that respect. The fact of the absurd portrayal of Court scenes are themselves sufficient to establish that the exact and exacting Lord High Chancellor, Francis Bacon, never wrote Shakespeare, for he would not, even under the license of the drama, present such law as we find in some of the plays. Now to give an illustration of the untenable character of Shakespeare's law, we will take the Court scene in The Merchant of Venice. Portia is represented as learned in the law, and comes laden with an opinion from the eminent Bellario. Portia assumes the bench and says to Shylock:

"Of a strange nature is the suit you follow;
Yet in such rule, that the Venetian law
Cannot impugn' you, as you do proceed.
You stand within this danger, do you not?"
[To Antonio.]

Here the Court deliberately passes on the legality of the contract under the Venetian law. (It must be understood that the laws of Venice were the civil laws which were ingrafted largely into the common law. The civil law to-day obtains in France and other nations, and is the law in Louisiana and Florida.)

The learned Portia then judicially says:

"Why this bond is forfeit;
And lawfully by this the Jew may claim
A pound of flesh, to be by him cut off Nearest the merchant's heart;—"

By the decision of this learned Justice, under the contract and the law, the pound of flesh could be cut off nearest the merchant's heart, and

"The Court awards it, and the law doth give it."

This being the judgment of the Court, Shylock prepares to execute the judgment in accord with its tenor, when Portia stops him, saying:

"This bond doth give thee here no jot of blood;
The words expressly are a pound of flesh;
Take then thy bond; take then thy pound of flesh,
But in cutting it, if thou doth shed
One drop of Christian blood, thy lands and goods
Are by the laws of Venice confiscated Unto the State of Venice."

Now we have in the civil law, the common law, and all law, this acknowledged proposition: That whenever any law, act or contract provides for any particular thing to be done, all things necessary and proper to render the same effectual are understood and implied. Thus, when a law declares a thing to be done, there is included in the act all things necessary to consummate that act. The shedding of blood was a necessary implication in the contract, and if the contract was legal, and the Venetian law recognized it, and that the Jew might lawfully claim his pound of flesh because the conditions of the contract had not been complied with by Antonio, and after a Court of competent jurisdiction had rendered a judgment to that effect, it would certainly be very queer law (dramatic law) that would declare the Jew's lands and goods forfeit unto the State of Venice for attempting to enforce a valid judgment of the Court. Shakespeare's law was stage law.

Not satisfied with the confiscation of the lands and goods of the plaintiff after a valid judgment, the Court goes further:

"Tarry, Jew;
The law hath yet another hold on you.
It is enacted in the laws of Venice,
If it be proved against an alien
That by direct or indirect attempts
He seek the life of any citizen,
The party 'gainst whom he doth contrive
Shall seize one half his goods; the other half
Comes to the privy coffer of the State;
And the offender's life lies in the mercy
Of the Duke only, 'gainst all other voice,
In which predicament, I say, thou stand'st;
For it appears by manifest proceedings,
That indirectly, and directly, too,
Thou hast contrived against the very life
Of the defendant."

No trial under any law in the world was ever known or conducted like this. A suitor comes into Court with a lawful contract; a valid judgment is rendered upon it in favor of plaintiff, and then the plaintiff's lands and goods are taken, and his life placed only at the mercy of the Duke, for doing all these lawful things. Lord Bacon wrote no such law, and it is purely dramatic law. In Winter's Tale, we find some more of the same kind of law. Hermione is brought before a Court of Justice and arraigned under an indictment, charging her with high treason to the State in committing adultery with Polixenes, King of Bohemia. After arraignment, she is portrayed as making a long speech in denying the act, and is by the Court, contrary to all known procedure, compelled to proceed in proof of her denials, before any evidence for the prosecution is presented. That is to say the defendant is called on to prove her innocence before there is any proof of guilt. Thus it appears that all law or Court procedure depicted on the stage has the illustrious precedents, from which there has been no departure in our modern drama.

We were not disappointed at the flattering reception accorded Col. Markham, on the occasion of the opening of the State campaign. He commenced his fight in San Francisco, believed by many to be the stronghold of his antagonist, and if judgment shall pass upon the matter of his reception, it will be a confirmation of our suggestion of last week, that Mr. Pond is not as popular in San Francisco as his friends anticipated. The address of Col. Markham was neat, and to the point. It outlined a governmental policy that will be of benefit to the people. While assuring that he will enter the office untrammelled by pledges to individuals or corporations, he gives assurance that respectful hearing will be accorded to all citizens. There have been instances where the governmental head became isolated from the people, and where advice was accepted but from the favored few; such administrations have not been particularly successful. With relation to the plank in the Republican platform pledging a reduction of the rate of State taxation to fifty cents or less on the one hundred dollars, Col. Markham distinctly pledges himself that he will carry it into effect, and doubtless appreciates that the State government can be amply maintained upon that or even a less percentage. Our Democratic friends, at their convention at San Jose, followed the line of the Republican platform and inserted the pledge that the rate of taxation should not exceed forty-five cents; going us five cents better—a sort of a nicker-in-the-slot movement. It is, however, unfortunate for them that the people will regard more the action of that party in the past, than its protestations of future uprightness, particularly when made with view to an election. The fact has been, and there can be no disguising, that Mr. Buckley controlled the last Democratic Legislature, and the appropriations made were unconscionable. They reflected no credit upon either the legislative or executive departments. A man of the firmness and fairness of Col. Markham at the head of the government will be invaluable, and with such an administration as he outlines the State will materially advance. In his election we will have the assurance that his time will be devoted to the duties of his office. On October fourth Col. Markham will address the people of this city. Immediately when the announcement of the meeting was made, preparation for it commenced. It will be practically the opening meeting of the campaign in this county, and from the outlook will be one of the most successful ever held in this city. There will be arranged an informal reception at which citizens, irrespective of party, will be invited to meet the candidate. On October twenty-fifth John B. Reddick, the nominee for Lieutenant-Governor, will address the people here. It is a matter of gratification that an attempt will be made to galvanize the Democratic party in this county. The Republicans are in a position somewhat awkward, in that they have nothing to fight and have simply rested upon their arms waiting for the enemy to exhibit a symptom of animation. It is the first time in our observation that there has been such a condition of affairs. It, however, indicates wisdom on the part of the minority; they will save much of their substance if they decline the combat.

Justice is our cardinal principle. While we censure, when censure is deserved, we at all times commend when a just thing is done. In matters pertaining to our local government by the Board of Trustees occasions have offered where the short-comings of its members were severely criticised. When the Board disclosed an apparent antagonism to certain franchises, under circumstances that provoked the thought that there was other than an honest purpose, we spoke in terms that could not be misunderstood against such action. With regard to the franchise for the electric street railroad, the Board, however, made amends and passed an ordinance framed to the satisfaction of all parties, as well as the public. Now come one of the contracting parties and asks the Board to embody an amendment which in effect takes from the Board, and all future Boards, the control of the streets, in so far as this particular franchise is concerned. It was proposed in relation to the control and direction of the manner of constructing and regulating the poles, etc., that the action of the Board shall be subject to review by the proper courts, and the city shall not have the right to remove nor to compel the removal of such poles if it shall appear to such courts that the use and maintenance of said system is not unsafe or dangerous. The Board of Trustees did exactly right in refusing to engraft such an amendment. It would, indeed, be a dangerous course for the city to abandon all municipal control over its streets and of the management of the company. Such a clause would fetter the city for all time and bind, not only the present Board, but all future local legislatures. It is virtually an imputation that this Board is dishonest and that no future Board could be trusted. We do not blame the Board for presenting this unwarranted assumption on the part of the holders of the franchise. It is unjust, in a personal point of view, and a power that should never be surrendered by the Board. It was a wise provision of our form of government that the three departments of government should be separated, and that one should not be allowed to encroach on another. In this case the control and power belongs to the Legislature, and should not be given to the judicial.

There are a number of people, especially in politics, who are like bottles; they have no value except that which is poured into them.

SAM STAPLES.

A Story of the Civil War.

Nearly every man is better than he is judged. Human depravity has to find its chief argument in individual cases. As a race, as a nation, as a community, mankind is a great success. The man who doubts this statement will bear watching.

In the year of 1862 we were in camp at Fairfax Court House, one of those half-baked settlements which were so commonly found in the South at the time of the war. They served their chief usefulness in designating localities from which dispatches might be dated and troops assembled.

Camp life is monotonous at the best, and when rainy weather and uninteresting localities are added, time flies with broken wings indeed. One afternoon as I sat just outside the camp in the shade of a friendly tree, adding fever to a bit of homesickness by reading a paper from home—advertisements and all—I was approached by a man who came from the direction of a camp of Pennsylvania troops a short distance away, and as he stopped before me he said, in that drawling, lazy tone, which identified him at once as a native: "Wal, stranger, I reckon I have struck a camp of New England Yanks."

"How so?" I answered.

"You are reading a newspaper; that's a sure flipper," said the man, as he put a pack or bundle down on the ground and at once converted it into a seat.

"You see," he continued, "you New England Yanks can always be spotted by two things—when you ain't stealing you're reading. They say that Ben Butler is one of the best read lawyers in your parts. That's the reason, I reckon, that he don't have to stop stealing down here to read up, as some of the rest of you do."

"Well, my friend," I remarked, "you can't be accused of hiding your sentiments, or lack of plain speech, can you?"

The man slid from his pack to the ground, and resting his head upon it, he took out a pipe and lit it as he said:

"Stranger, when you uns visited Vergina, goin' on two years ago now, I was as well off, I reckon, as most of my neighbors. My niggers were good stock, and my place was kept up well nigh as well as any about. I had a good market in Richmond, which was only six miles away, and everything was prospering."

"Well," said I, "what change has taken place?"

"Change! change!" replied the man, as a look of sadness came over his face, and he seemed to be looking into the past and thinking of the past as well. "Change! I count it something of a change when a man don't know where his family is, his niggers gone and his place deserted. You may be a good ways from home, lad, but if you live you've got a home to go to, while I, right here in the State where I was born, the State that I have loved nigh on to fifty years, almost within sight of the place where my children were born, here, I can say, I am a wanderer on God's earth, and have no place to lay my head but there," and lifting himself up, he pointed with his thin finger to the pack at his feet, while I saw a tear finding its way down his sunburned face.

I was hardly more than a boy. I had come from a State where children were taught the awful crime of slavery, and in the freshly printed pages of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" I had read the thrilling story of the slave and the slave driver. To me all men south of Mason and Dixon's line had the blood of human beings upon their hands, the curse and horror of slavery upon their souls, and yet, so great is the power of human sympathy that I found myself with outstretched hand, as I said: "I have no reason to be homesick when I hear such words as these. It is a poor thing to offer, perhaps, but I can say, How deeply I sympathize with you."

He did not take my hand. He did not look toward me. With that far-away look upon his face, and a bitterness in his voice I have hardly ever heard equaled, he said, as he swept his brown hand over his face:

"Robbed and ruined by Yankee invaders; home gone and hope gone; no fight ahead, no heart to live."

"Not so bad as that," I said; "what if the Confederates win?"

Then the man looked at me. His face grew almost black as he thundered: "Worse, a thousand times worse. Much as I hate you Yankees, I have no part nor parcel with these men who are conducting our cause. Every man in our army, from Lee down, are mighty men of valor and ought to win, but they won't—they won't. Richmond is fighting our army more than yours, and Richmond will destroy the Confederacy. Mark me, young man, I am no prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but you can write it down that the Confederate States of America are never to take a place among the Nations of the earth, and you can sign Sam Staples's name to it. That's my name."

While my visitor had been talking I was deeply engaged in studying him. I have seldom seen a more interesting man. He was of slight build, not above the medium height; his unkempt hair was rather long, and impressed me with the conviction that it had turned gray very rapidly; his eyes were deep black and restless; he had no beard, and all his features combined in making a very striking face. He was dressed in a suit of home-spun gray cloth that hung loosely upon his slight frame and gave the appearance of clothing a very much more ordinary man than I felt the man before me was. His appearance was no more striking than his words. I had heard of Northern copperheads, but this was the first instance of the existence of Southern copperheads that had ever come to my attention. Here was a man distinctly Southern born, both by birth and natural aptitude. All his sympathies were with his people and their cause was his, without a question. Still he predicted a downfall and utter failure of the Confederacy because of his conviction that the government at Richmond was more to be feared than all the forces of the North.

"Well," I said at last, "if you have no confidence in your so-called Government, why do you express yourself so bitterly against us? Surely you must see that, from your view of the case, the Union is to be reestablished; and that being the case, why not accept the inevitable and try to get a correct understanding of the relations between the North and the South?"

"Correct understanding?" he answered; "a correct understanding is this: The Northern Yankees should go back where they came from and leave us alone; we don't want their company, and we don't admit their right to interfere in our affairs. This is the beginning and ending of all arguments about this matter."

While I was forced to admit in my own mind the uselessness of discussing the question involved in the war with the man, I at the same time could not refrain from asking him some questions, and the result was another hour spent in talk that evidently ended just where it began. At its close my caller took up his pack and said:

"Well, I reckon I had better attend to business."

Thereupon he proceeded to open his pack and offer for sale a general assortment of writing materials, pipes, knives and such other articles as would naturally find sale among soldiers. He told me he purchased most of his stock in Alexandria, and made out, by charging good prices, to save something. To my suggestion that he might do better trading among the Confederate soldiers, as he sympathized with them and would naturally secure their trade, he said:

"This is business with me. I am not ready to pay for my goods in Union money, as I have to, and sell for Confederate scrip. No; I shall count Confederate dollars as dollars when they will buy a dollar's worth of goods."

After I had made a few purchases of him, the Virginian moved on down through the camp, and I went to my quarters.

* * * * *

Some weeks later, as we were proceeding toward the front and had nearly reached Catlett's station on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, we heard sharp firing directly in our front, and evidently not more than a mile away. Pushing forward with all possible speed, we arrived upon the ground just as two regiments of Union cavalry had put to flight, after a sharp engagement, a brigade of rebel cavalry, capturing a number of prisoners, among whom were many wounded. The day was unusually warm for that time of year, and we found plenty to do to attend to the wants of the wounded and dying. Hastily converting an old barn that stood upon the ground into a hospital, some of us did what we could for the comfort of the wounded. It had been almost entirely a hand-to-hand engagement, and many of the wounded were suffering from cruel saber cuts. One poor fellow I remember whose back had literally been laid open by a saber cut that extended from his neck to the saddle on his horse. Another lay upon his back with one hand over his face, crying in bitter agony: "I shall never see them again, my darling mother and sister." We looked him over carefully and could find no trace of a wound; at last he lifted his hand from his face and both eyes were gone. For three hours we continued this work of gathering up the harvest of a battle-field where death had been the most prolific reaper.

When the little that we could do had been accomplished I turned away toward another part of the field.

Away yonder under a clump of trees I saw considerable of a gathering, and being anxious to dispel as much as possible the impressions of the last few hours by other scenes, I made my way in that direction. As I neared the place I met one of our boys and inquired the object of special interest that seemed to engage the attention of the company he had just left.

"Don't you know what has been going on?" said he, "where have you been?"

I replied that I had been over at the station ever since our arrival.

"Well, go down there," he remarked, "and you'll see something interesting."

So saying he went and I continued my journey. I had not far to go and was soon upon the spot. Gathered together under a tree I found a company of officers examining very intently some papers.

"Well, Captain, what have you got? Fresh orders?"

The Captain whom I addressed looked at me a moment, then pointed over his shoulder without saying a word. Looking in the direction indicated, I was filled with amazement to see, hanging to the limb of a tree not fifty feet away, the lifeless form of a man. One would hardly suppose that, after such an afternoon, the sight which met my gaze would so affect me, and yet, as I took in the awful reality of that scene I felt a sickening sensation that compelled me to seek a spot where I might sit down.

"What does this mean?" said I at last.

"It means," said Sergeant Derby, who lay sprawled out upon the grass at my feet, calmly smoking his pipe, "it means that we have just hung a spy, proof positive, no appeal."

Then I was shown the proof. He had been captured during the fight and held a prisoner until such time as an examination could be made, to account for his presence upon the field, as he was unarmed and ununiformed. To all questions he was as mute as though nature had denied him the gift of speech. Upon examining his pockets there were found passes from Secretary of War Stanton and many Union Generals. Also, any quantity of passes from Jeff Davis and Confederate officials, high and low. The man was well equipped—maps and plans of Union territory and camps without number. Together with this mass of evidence was a memorandum book nearly filled with closely-written pages, giving in detail his journeys and experience, and stamping him as one of the most daring and successful rebel spies living.

As I read this collection of documents, I found myself equal to the sight before me. Indeed, I became interested in surveying the spectacle of a spy who had come to the end of his rope. The body was hanging with back toward me. At last I walked down to get a nearer view. As I passed around the body I glanced up and beheld the face of Sam Staples.

* * * * *

Something induced me to make a closer examination of the memorandum-book found upon Staples, and at last I was rewarded by finding the following entries under a date which I can not recall, but which was doubtless correct:

"To-day I visited the camp of some Vermont Yanks and did a thriving trade. Just outside the camp I came across a credulous young fellow to whom I related my old yarn about loss of niggers and family, and that I had not where to lay my head. (His was soft enough not to need a pillow.) Gave him some of the stuff about having no confidence in the Richmond Government, produced two or three tears to seal the sad tale, and came away with the lad's blessing."

This extract from the diary of Sam Staples accounts for the paragraph with which this article begins, and warrants me, I think, in citing this famous spy as an example of total human depravity.—Boston Herald.

Tobacco Users.

All Asiatics may be said to use tobacco.

The water pipe is the favorite in the Balkan peninsula.

The French, as a nation, smoke cigars; the Germans, pipes.

Both in India and Afghanistan tobacco is called "timbakoo."

The Chinese use a handsome little water pipe made entirely of brass or silver.

It is estimated that half the male population throughout Christendom use tobacco.

In Persia the water pipe has a straight, stiff stem, instead of the pliant coil of the Turks.

The English custom of smoking brierwood pipes on the street is growing in some eastern cities.

In Japan both men and women smoke metal pipes, and women are as inveterate smokers as men.

In England the proportion of chewers is smaller than in the United States, but the habit has increased largely in the last decade.

The Austrian smoker carries with him on all occasions a pipe with a crooked mouthpiece, a long, straight wooden stem and a big porcelain or wooden bowl.

Many of the peasantry in Persia smoke the chibouk, a pipe with small earthenware bowl and stem about as thick as a broom handle, which is placed against the lips.

The Turks are inveterate smokers of the water pipe, smoking vast quantities of cigarettes also, and the Sultan owns jeweled water pipes of fabulous value that have been imperial heirlooms for generations.

The whole tobacco industry of Turkey is under the control of a monopoly called the Regie, which pays a fixed sum annually for the exclusive right to manufacture and sell tobacco in that country. Steamboats and cars in Turkey have private smoking-compartments for ladies.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Mr. and Mrs. Kendal are now playing The Squire in the English provinces.

Bingo—"How is it that you find fault with every play that comes along?" Dramatic Critic—"Folks would think I didn't know anything if I didn't find fault."

A prominent writer of farce comedies has been in communication with Managers E. G. Gilmore and Alexander Comstock, of the Academy, with a view to furnishing a suitable piece for Barney Fagan and Bob Slavin who are to discard black face next season and take the road under the direction of the Academy's executives. Fagan has long been identified with successful spectacular effects in minstrelsy, and in the new venture will aim to devise picturesque dances, marches and drills, with pretty and graceful women. Slavin will be looked to for the fun of the piece.

A curious parallel in the drollery of a passage of Shakespeare's and one in Sudraka's Mrichchakati is noted by the translator of The Toy Cart. In the Sanscrit play, Sams tahnaka, the doltish villain of the piece, says:

I must search for Vasantasena.
The Vita—Indeed. (Aloud.) Is there not anything by which you may trace her?
Sams—What should there be?
Vita—The tinkling of her ornaments; the odor of her perfumes; and the fragrance of her garlands.
Sams—Very true; I can hear with my nostrils the scent of her garlands spreading through the darkness, but I do not see the sound of her ornaments.

And in the Midsummer Night's Dream, iii, i, 78, and v, i, 189, we read:

Flute—Must I speak now?
Mince—Ay, marry, you must; for you must understand he goes but to see a voice that he heard.
Pyramus—I see a voice; now will I to the clink,
To spy an' I can hear my Thisby's face.

Mr. Charles M. Skinner writes entertainingly of The Villain, in the Dramatic Mirror. He says: "If one had the means of tracing dramatic types of characters back to their origin, he would doubtless find the villain officiating as the devil in the medieval mystery plays. The real villain does not exist in Greek drama. The people in Æschylus and Sophocles who violate the proprieties appear as much the agents of fate as victims of their own passions, and when they commit a murder the chorus assembles and deplores the necessity for it, unloading the moral responsibility for the crime upon the gods, who order all things and juggle with the fortunes of men. By Shakespeare's time the villain had become an accepted fact in the drama, and Iago will stand for ages as a concrete of evil. Goethe, in his parable of Faust, restores the arch fiend to the stage, yet, strange as it may appear, this personage does not impress one as half so wicked a creature as the villain of English melodrama who conceals his father's will and plunges his brothers and sisters into poverty. There is a certain bonhomie about 'Mephistopheles,' and if we met him at the club, we should vote him a devilish good fellow; he sings a good song, he furnishes good wine, he knows a pretty girl when he sees one, he is a witty and companionable chatter-box, he has chic, and beside these qualities austere virtues make only poor show. In the economy of the play he is more than an agent of ill. He symbolizes the night side of life and nature, he is 'the spirit that denies,' he holds his head erect in every presence, and has a kind of gross respect for himself. With the typical villain it is different. He is smaller than 'Mephistopheles,' mentally and morally. The basis of his evil is malice and selfishness—a selfishness that is usually so narrow, so ungenial, so foolish withal, that it becomes disgusting. The stage villain is a villain for ethical purposes, to some extent—he is always overtaken by the effect of some egregious folly in the fifth act—but he is valued in a still greater degree for artistic purposes—purposes of motive and contrast. He is not in nature. There is no force that is inherently malign, and moral monstrosities like 'Jesse Pomeroy' and the European princes that are for sale to American fathers-in-law are so rare as to prove the rule. The villain lingers through the play as a shadow that makes purity and heroism shine brighter by comparison. In melodrama we follow the temporary successes of the villain with inward protest; and, although he gets his desert at last, the good people have so much harder a time than he, that the moral effect of his punishment is modified, as it is in the case of the thief whose lawyers keep him out of Sing Sing by delays, retrials, adjournments and appeals until his theft is forgotten. The villain does not exist off the stage—then why not drop him from the mask of life?"

Book Chat.

Eugene Field writes to the Chicago News as follows: It may interest lakeside literary circles to know that my translation of the epics of Homer will be sent to the press early next spring. The Chicago Association for the Promotion of an International Copyright has signified its desire to become my patron, and therefore I shall dedicate the work to it. I follow the Homeric text pretty closely, but I transfer the scene from Troy to Cook county, and for Hector, Ulysses, Priam, Ajax and the rest, I simply substitute the names of Pullman, McVicker, Gage, Ford, Peck and other people now on earth. I want to popularize Homer among the hustlers. Here, for example, is just a little bit which fairly illustrates the majestic swing and felicitous modernization of the noble poem:

Ere from the east the many tinted morn
Peeped at the seas of ol' the poor Indian corn,
The ox-eyed Armour from his perfumed halls
Strode forth to boss things at the stock-yard stalls;
Nor paused to take a joy-impelling nip
Pleasing alike to stomach, palate, lip—
Provoking mirth, yet taking often brings
The ache-engendering jag and such like things,

About his form a purple robe he wore
And in his hand his shining weapon bore—
The beef-producing spear! whose lightning blow
Failed not to fell the corn-fed cattle low!
The bull-eyed bull, likewise the steer-eyed steer,
The cow-eyed cow stood not before that spear;
Last, but not least, full many a calf-eyed veal
Had felt the fatal force of Armour's steel.

The girth thereof, measured from left to right
And vice versa, differed not a mite;
Three cubits long in length did it extend,
Three cubits long from either end to end,
And these two ends adjusted were so true
That the same distance lay between the two.
Big two-pound diamonds in the hilt made light
Of nature's darkness—even day of night!
'Twas not yet morn (as I remarked before),
Yet as he issued from his palace door
This blaze-compelling spear changed nature so
The neighbors' roosters straight began to crow,
And Pullman, waking up, was queered to see
'Twas half-past five, at only half-past three.

Daudet is said to be an inveterate smoker and an enthusiastic worker, sometimes working on through the twenty-four hours, and locking the door against his wife, "lest she should compel him to go to bed." There are many wives of literary and other men who would doubtless like to know Mme. Daudet's recipe for compelling her husband to be sensible.

The immortal fiction poured out upon the country is vastly more depraving than are the reportorial narrations made in the respectable newspapers of the country. The evil has suddenly seized upon society. What are the good people, the heads of families, the teachers of youth, the protectors of the purity and honor of the family circle going to do about it.

The story goes that a melancholy author went to Dumas and moaned that if he did not raise three hundred francs he was afraid he would have to charcoal-smoke himself and his two children. Dumas rummaged his coffers at once, but could find only two hundred francs. "But I must have three or I and the little loves are lost," said the author. "Suppose you suffocate yourself and one of them, then," said Dumas.

An old Mississippi river pilot says that "Mark Twain" was the laziest white man he ever saw in a pilot house.

Prof. Huxley has a son-in-law who is something of an artist and still more of a wag. A recent picture from his studio represents his young wife, the professor's beautiful daughter, fast asleep in an arm-chair. At her feet, its pages tumbled by its fall, is a book, of which the title, "Lay Sermons by Huxley," may be plainly discerned.

In answer to the question whether too much reading of newspapers destroys a taste for books, we should apply the principle that too much of any good thing is bad—that as too much reading of books is apt to clog the intellect, so too much reading of newspapers is apt to create a distaste for books. The newspaper has evolved into something more of late years than a mere vehicle for the conveyance, to the public eye, of news. It has of late invaded the province which books formerly occupied alone.

Professional Chat.

The man who gets into the Courts is very often plaintive as well as defendant.

High-priced doctor—"You are now convalescent, and all you need is exercise. You should walk ten, twenty, thirty miles a day, sir, but your walking should have an object." Patient—"All right, doctor. I'll travel around trying to borrow enough to pay your bill."

Prof. Totten, of Yale, who recently identified Joshua's "long day," has now determined by long calculation that the day of the reversion of the sun's shadow on the shield of Ahaz was the 1,202,744th from the day of creation, or Wednesday, the 18th day of the first civil and seventh sacred month of the year 3293 A. M. This is the day in which Joshua proclaims that the sun stood still.

The philosopher Diogenes was invited one day to dine at the house of a man who, though very wealthy, had taken no pains to cultivate his mind. The philosopher coughed, and having long sought in vain a place to spit, spat at last upon his host, who hotly remonstrated. "Why are you astonished?" said the philosopher. "Everything in the room is perfect, the floor is laid with a superb mosaic, the carpets and the chairs are of a marvellous workmanship, there is nothing base and low here but yourself, it is therefore upon you that I spit!"

An African chief had a bad cold and sent for his family physician. This gentleman could no more cure a cold than any civilized doctor, and was as little likely to confess it. His business, of course, was to give a prescription, not impossible to be made up, but a little out of the way, so as to inspire confidence and suggest anatomical study. He prescribed a little fat cut from the heart of a fat man. Unhappily (for the doctor), all the attendants of the chief were lean, but the doctor himself was fat, but the chief, being unaccustomed to wait for anything—far less a cure for a cold—immediately put him to death and put his advice into execution.

Chief Engineer Towne, of the navy, is a large man, who looks like Grover Cleveland, and who has the faculty of saying good things well. During the recent visit of Mr. Yarrow, the English torpedo boat builder, Mr. Towne and a number of his brother officers called on Mr. and Mrs. Yarrow at the Arlington. The evening was warm, and a pleasant breeze was blowing through the open window. Mr. Yarrow was noticeably careful to sit in a corner, and after a time remarked: "You Americans are verwy careless, don't you know, about sitting in drafts. Now, in England, you know, we don't think of doing that sort of thing." "No doubt," replied Mr. Towne, "but you see we had such a severe draft in America during the war that we never mind a little thing like this." The representative of Britain never smiled, and was plainly at a loss to see the connection between war and atmospheric agitation.

M. Paul de Remusat relates that visiting once his friend, M. Thiers, who had not yet become President of the French Republic, but was one of the most noted orators of Europe, he found the great statesman at his desk, busy with paper and pen. "You come just in time," said Thiers, "I am just finishing the speech that I am to deliver in the Corps Legislatif to-morrow. I will read you some passages, and you may tell me just what you think about it." It was, perhaps, M. Thiers' most famous speech—his great impeachment of Napoleon III and his policy. The young man listened with interest, and ventured to say after the reading that, while the address was a remarkably strong one, he missed something of the easy, natural, perfectly simple method which was characteristic of M. Thiers. "You are right," said the great orator; "I haven't put in the negligences yet." Taking his pen, he proceeded to add a touch of negligent ease here and there, changing careful expressions to careless ones. "Now," he said at last, "it is spontaneous."

NOTES.

The State Fair this year has been a decided success, notwithstanding the general business depression. The Pavilion displays were fully up to the average, and the races and Park attractions exceptionally good.

The contract for the building of the foundation of the new Postoffice has been let, and there is a prospect that work will be immediately commenced. The figures for the foundation are $40,251.

First Bunco Steerer—"Pipe his nibs, Zeke. Here's a farmer, sure; got genooine hayseed in his hair." Second Bunco Steerer—"Ah, say, chase yerself. Dat ain't no farmer. Dat's a candidate been workin' de county fairs."

We have received the admission day number of the Golden West, the organ of the Native Sons and Daughters. It comprises fifty-two pages and contains much valuable historical matter. The illustrations are asty and the publication is creditable in every way.

Congress at present consists of 330 members. The British House of Commons consists of 670 members, the German Reichstag has 397, the French Chamber of Deputies 573, and the French Senate 300. The new Apportionment bill of Representative Durnell proposes to increase the membership of the House to 354.

The American County Central Committee, at a meeting held Thursday night, selected gentlemen to represent this county on the State Central Committee, and issued a call for a county convention, that will be held on the 27th inst. There is a promise that a full county ticket will be nominated. The county convention, it will be observed, will be held two days after the Democratic convention.

Our Democratic friends have evidently a full appreciation of the situation the last Buckley Legislature placed them in, but it is a little too late to square the matter with the tax-payers. Possibly the American citizen is more sensitive at his pocket than anywhere else. We are of the opinion this characteristic will be very plainly demonstrated in November. Mr. Buckley's Legislature was one of note; we will mark'em.

The death, at San Francisco, of Solomon Heidenfeldt, removed one of their earliest jurists of this State, and a lawyer of distinguished ability. Our Supreme Court was constituted in December, 1849, and three Justices were elected by the Legislature. S. C. Hastings was chosen Chief Justice, and in September, 1851, Judge Heydenfeldt was elected by the people to succeed him, and served upon the bench until his resignation in January, 1857. Since his retirement from the bench, Judge Heydenfeldt enjoyed a lucrative law practice, and was connected with most of the important mining litigation.

There is a popular belief that a comparatively small percentage of persons are susceptible to hypnotic influence. It has been developed by actual experiments that about 90 per cent of men and 94 per cent of women are more or less susceptible. People of warm climates are more easily placed under the power than those of cold. They are hypnotized in less time, and the sleep is very deep. This susceptibility mostly depends upon the willingness of the subject, and his faith in the hypnotizer. There are various ways of producing hypnosis—as numerous as the operators.

A serious question demands the attention of the people of San Francisco. It is that of the composition of the legislative tickets. Largely the evils from which the people have suffered are directly attributable to the legislative department. The early Legislatures of this State were composed largely of men of high rank, but with the ending of the session of 1873-74 there has been a marked decadence. In that session there sat in the Senate three men who afterward filled the office of Governor—Irwin, Perkins and Bartlett. Among the Senators were M. C. Andross, John Boggs, J. J. De Haven, George S. Evans, James T. Farley, S. J. Finney, Thomas Frazer, W. T. Garrett, Edward Gibbons, W. J. Graves, W. C. Hendricks, Thomas H. Laine, Henry Edgerton, Thomas Beck, W. W. Pendragast and Philip A. Roach. Most of the men whose names we mentioned are dead. The lower house ranked equally high. Morris M. Estee was the Speaker, and among its members were A. L. Chandler, J. F. Cowdery and John F. Swift. The delegations from San Francisco were of a different stamp from those returned since, and during the administration of Mr. Buckley, it has been in later sessions that the corrupting influence of the blind boss has permeated the Legislatures to the extent that usefulness has been practically destroyed. The biennial sessions are regarded as a menace to the people, and it is about time the people of San Francisco will elect men to these important positions who will command public confidence. Particularly is it desirable that there will be no repetition of the recklessness that disgraced the last Legislature. So sure as Buckley will have control of the selections in San Francisco there will be trouble, and he ought to have sense enough to appreciate it.

A meeting was held Friday night at San Francisco to protest against the conviction for contempt pronounced against J. H. Barry, of the Weekly Star. While we have no sympathy generally for editors who involve themselves into trouble, we must say the criticisms of Mr. Barry were just and entirely warranted by the conduct of those he censured. It is a matter of congratulation that the course of his paper is approved by the better element, and while the punishment he is receiving is humiliating, yet there will be the result that a fuller understanding will be had of the rights of journals to criticize judicial action. An unjust comment concerning an individual or officer, carries no force with it, and exposes the writer and publisher to contempt; a just commentary upon the acts of public men has always been productive of good, and the victim gains respect while the officer who exercises unwarranted power earns contempt.

The new register of Sacramento county ordinarily carries about 10,000 names. At the election held two years ago the total number of votes cast was 8,390. So far the registrations are closely approaching 5,000. It is very evident that between three and four thousand voters have not been enrolled. The time is getting short, and it is extremely desirable that every citizen should be registered. We have always believed that the compilation of the new register was unnecessary, and that it would result in confusion to the people and unnecessary expense to the county. It has so resulted; and notwithstanding the efforts that have been made to secure a full enrollment it is apparent that many will be disfranchised through negligence or misapprehension. The Republican committee at the outset arranged for a checking of the work with a view that the register when completed would embrace the names of all legal voters. The work inaugurated by that committee will be pursued, and it would not be a bad idea for the other political parties to devote some attention to the details of the campaign.

Never in the history of Sacramento has there been such a total disregard of law and decency, and such wholesale daylight robbery as occurred during the past two weeks. Under the name of gambling men are fleeced—aye robbed of their money by bunko sharps and thimble riggers. There are just two propositions connected with the allowance of such a state of affairs: Either the police are too stupid and ignorant to be alive to the existence of this thieving, or else they are dishonest and do not desire to interfere with the schemes of robbery. In either case it is a sad commentary on our municipal government, particularly the police department. One day this week no less than six cases of this class of robbery were reported at police headquarters, and warrants issued. It was a noticeable fact that the culprits were promptly notified of these proceedings by either policemen or men who were close to portions of the police department, and when the officers bearing the warrants instituted search for the villains they could not be found. There is no excuse for our peace officers' negligence in these matters. Any one, every one who takes the trouble to look around can see the scoundrels plying their calling on any corner. Their headquarters are known, and the line of operations is familiar to all. Thus there would be little difficulty in driving them away from the city and thus saving our reputation as well as the money of the victims. It is no uncommon thing to hear those vultures boasting of their exploits in robbing "suckers", and that to in public saloons. So bold have they become that they consider our police interference, or non-interference rather, in the light of a joke.

After many years, to-day will be unveiled a statue of Horace Greeley, at New York, in front of the Tribune building. Greeley was one of the greatest men of the age. He was opposed to slavery, but deprecated northern interference, and opposed all anti-slavery societies in the North. He believed prohibition impracticable, but was in favor of high license. He was virtually the father of a protective tariff. This tribute to the memory of such a great man, while late, is nevertheless appropriate. The statesmen of the Republican party are but now carrying out the ideas and principles advanced by Horace Greeley years ago. When some of the dissatisfied Republicans, under the name of the Liberal Republican party, induced Greeley to enter the campaign for President against General Grant, and the indorsement of the Democratic National Convention, it only served to set the seeds for his dissolution. The excitement of the campaign, and his defeat, went far to produce the fatal result of November 29, 1872, about one year after his defeat. While his candidacy was disapproved by his true friends, it did not weaken their friendship for him. Immediately after the election, Henry Ward Beecher wrote to him thus: "You may think, amidst clouds of smoke and dust, that all your old friends who parted company with you in the late campaign, will turn a momentary difference with a life-long alienation. It will not be so. I speak for myself, and also from what I perceive in other men's hearts. Your mere political influence may for a time be impaired, but your own power for good in the far wider fields of industrial economy, social and civil criticism, and general well being of society will not be lessened, but augmented." But the good work was never realized; his usefulness had been destroyed.

The Right of Trial by Jury Cannot be Denied, in California.

There has been considerable false sentiment indulged in by a few of our Courts, wherein they have arbitrarily denied the right of trial by jury in certain misdemeanor cases. We have taken occasion to examine this question from a legal standpoint, and here give the result of our research:

The right of trial by jury is a constitutional right, and in cases of misdemeanor can only be waived by both sides by an order entered of record. Article 3, Subdivision 3, of Section 2 of the Federal Constitution reads: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." The Constitution of 1863 reads: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate forever; but a jury may be waived by the parties in all civil cases, in the manner to be prescribed by law."

If there should be any question about the limitations to trial by jury at common law, all those conditions are abrogated by the Constitution of 1879, which even under that theory has modified the common law doctrine. There are not to be found any other Constitutions which gives the right of trial by jury like the provisions in our present Constitution. Section 7 of Article 1 reads: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate; but in civil actions three-fourths of the jury may render a verdict. A trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases, not amounting to a felony, by the consent of both parties, expressed in open Court, and in civil actions by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law. In civil actions and cases of misdemeanor, the jury may consist of twelve, or any number less than twelve upon which the parties may agree in open Court." It will be observed that the language used in this section: "A trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases, not amounting to felony," is not to be found in any other State Constitution, nor has this provision ever been construed, except indirectly, by the Supreme Court of this State. Ex parte Miller, 82 Cal., the Court said: "If a jury was denied, it was error which cannot be reached on habeas corpus." According to the Court it could only be reached on appeal. Suppose the last Legislature had passed a law denying the right of trial by jury to defendants in misdemeanor cases, and the Court was called upon to pass upon the constitutionality of such a law, what force could be given to the language of the provision providing for a waiver of a jury trial, except it would be that the language was a limitation on the power of the Legislature, and that such a law would be unconstitutional? Our constitutional provision is an enlargement of the common law. By examining the action of the Legislature since the adoption of the Constitution of 1879: Before the adoption of that instrument Section 689, Penal Code, read: "No person can be convicted of a public offense unless by the verdict of jury, accepted and recorded by the Court, or upon plea of guilty, or upon judgment against him upon demurrer to the indictment in the case mentioned in Section 1011, or upon a judgment of a Police or Justice's Court, a jury having been waived." This section was amended in 1880 by adding these words: "In a criminal case not amounting to a felony."

Section 1042 of the Penal Code before the adoption of the Constitution, read: "Issues of fact must be tried by jury."

The same sections as amended in 1880, reads: "Issues of fact must be tried by jury, unless a trial by jury be waived in criminal cases not amounting to felony, by the consent of both parties, expressed in open Court and entered in its minutes. In cases of misdemeanor the jury consists of twelve, or any number less than twelve upon which the parties may agree in open Court."

Section 1435, Penal Code, before the adoption of our present Constitution, read:

"Before the Court hears any testimony upon the trial the defendant may demand a trial by jury"—

As amended in 1889: "A trial by jury may be waived by the consent of both parties expressed in open Court and entered in the docket." These are in reference to trials in Justices' and Police Courts.

From this it is self evident that the Legislature has sought to harmonize the Penal Code with the changed condition of Section 7, of Article 1, of the Constitution. Not only has the common law doctrine—that certain misdemeanors were not entitled to trial by jury—been adopted by the Constitution, but the statute following that Constitution carries out the changed condition, and makes the intention of the framers of the Constitution and the law makers plain, and that all common law rules are thereby abrogated.

Section 15 of the Penal Code defines what is a public offense—a crime. Under that, vagrancy is a crime—a public offense.

Section 17, Penal Code. Every crime is a misdemeanor which is not punishable by death or imprisonment in the State's prison.

The word misdemeanor at the common law embraced two grades of crime, high and low misdemeanor. Certainly under our Constitution there is no such distinction. The word is used in its general sense to apply to misdemeanors under our Constitution and laws.

In Pillsbury vs. Brown, 47 Cal. 480, a misdemeanor is defined to be "an act or omission for which a punishment, other than death or imprisonment in the State prison, is denounced by law—that is, by the will of the supreme power, expressed by statute."

The common law rules are abrogated by the Codes of California. Section 4, Penal Code, Sections 4 and 18, Political Code. There are no such things under our Codes as "common law offenses."

Globular Lightning.

This is a rare phenomenon. The general description of the occurrence is, that a luminous ball is seen moving very slowly, not touching any object, and eventually breaking up with a violent explosion and the appearance of several flashes of ordinary lightning. It is reported that the occurrence described has lasted at least a couple of seconds. Ordinary lightning, as is well known, is practically quite instantaneous. The size of the ball on different occasions has varied from that of an orange to that of a large glass lamp globe, or even larger. Many physicists refuse to believe any accounts of this manifestation of the electrical discharge, but the reports of it are too numerous and circumstantial for us to consider them to be entirely baseless.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Midnight Bell is also booked for an early date.

Henry E. Dixey, in Adonis, will appear at the Metropolitan with his star company on October 13th. A rare treat.

W. J. Scanlan presented his new and popular play, Myles Aroon, at the Clunie last night to a large and delighted audience. Scanlan was ever a favorite in Irish character. To-night Shane na Lawn. In these dramas Scanlan has introduced new and taking songs.

That very bad custom of not raising the curtain until half-past eight still continues. During the warm summer months when the days were long there might have been some little excuse for it, but now when the nights are growing long, half-past eight is an unreasonable and unreasonable hour.

The Grismer-Davies company have continued to do a good business. To-night is the last of the season. We were given a genuine treat and surprise on Monday night when Phoebe Davis essayed the role so often presented by would-be stars—that of a rollicking girl, full of life, love, ambition and courage. In the character of Carrie Pulhoun in Beacon Lights she developed a remarkable versatility. Her splendid personation captured the audience, which gave her round after round of applause. In this line of character such actresses as Minnie Palmer and that class cannot be compared to Phoebe Davies. She gave life and zest to her acting without apparently the least effort, and her artistic work was free from the "kicks" and "antics" employed by those who claim a pre-emption right to this role. Phoebe Davies is an artist in any line of character. Scott Cooper is a good character actor, and gave us a good personation of the Southern gentleman who fought in the war, "by gad, sir!" Grismer was at home as Captain Allen of the Twenty-fifth United States Cavalry. Della Macquaid looked and acted the "Trumpeter." There are some members of the company that could be greatly improved on.

The telegraph announces the death of Dion Boucicault, a noted dramatist. Of late years he has devoted himself to the elevation of the stage, and has written a number of review articles for magazines. While his plays were not altogether original, many of them being mere adaptations from the French and other sources, his dramatic effects are his own, and abound in pathos, passion, sentiment and wit. Boucicault produced the following plays: London Assurance, Colleen Bawn, The Octoroon, Dot, Relief of Lucknow, Trial of Effie Dean, Streets of London, Arrah-na-Pogue, Rip Van Winkle, The Flying Scud, Hunted Down, The Long Strike, How She Loved Him, Foul Play, After Dark, Lost at Sea, Formosa, The Rapparee, Jezebel, Babil and Bijou, Daddy O'Dowd, Mora, Mimi, Led Astray, Jaulet's Pride, Louis XI, Faust and Marguerite, Paul Lafarge, A Dark Night's Work, The Dead Secret, Andy Blake, Shaughraun, Parish Clerk, and others of lesser note. Boucicault was born in Dublin, December 26, 1822, and produced his greatest success, London Assurance, when he was about 18 years of age. In a late number of the North American Review he devotes an article to his early experience as a dramatist and how he came to write the first drama.

Johnstown Disaster.

Thomas F. Kirk, saxophone player of Liberati's band, says: "A number of Mathushek pianos were buried in seven foot of mud at the Johnstown flood. After being taken out, were repaired, and as good as ever, while all wood-frame pianos under the same circumstances, were rendered worthless." Moral: Buy a solid iron-frame Mathushek piano of John F. Cooper, 631 J street.

Curious Definitions.

Many of the definitions in the English Dictionary of 1626 are amusing and some of them are ludicrously absurd. The "pole" is described as "the end of the axle tree whereon the heavens do move," a very primitive explanation. The "Hebridean wave" seems rather a poetical substitute for the "Irish Sea," and a "badger" is a still more extraordinary equivalent for a corn merchant—"one that buys corn or other victual in one place to sell it in another." Still funnier are some of the natural history definitions. A "baboon" is said to be "a beast like an ape, but farre bigger;" a "lynx" is "a spotted beast; it hath a most perfect sight, insomuch as it is said that it can see thowr a wall." The account of the "salamander" reads like an elaborate joke—"a small, venomous beast, with foure feet and a short taile; it lives in the fire, and at length, by his extreme cold, puts out the fire."

Turning to more general topics, we have the "alphabet" defined as "the cross rowe of letters," and "abecedarian" is "one who teaches the cross rowe." According to Cockeram, "an idiot" is "an unlea ned asse;" a "labourer" is a "swinker;" and "a heretick" is sketched more roundaboutly, but with a clear assertion of the right of private opinion, as "he which maketh choice of himselfe what poynts of religion he will believe an l wlat he will not." Then from classic times the "Olympic games" are "solemn games of activity," and "Amphitrite" is not, as usual, the goddess of the sea, but the "sea" itself. Mathematics and "matematicians" are hardly dealt with.

The latter means a "soothsayer," and the science, as defined, includes nearly all knowledge—"the arts of arithmetic, music, geographie, geometrie, astronomy, astrology, cosmography," reminding one of the trivium and quadrivium of the schoolmen of the Middle Ages. "Actresse" has a very literal and interesting signification—"a woman doer," but at this decade of the seventeenth century there were no actresses in the modern sense of the term, the female parts being then taken by boys and young men. Women actors first appeared in 1660.

Gems From Thackeray.

As you can seldom fashion your tongue to speak a new language after twenty; the heart refuses to receive friendship pretty soon; it gets too hard to yield to the impression.—Pendennis.

Who carries his heart entire to the grave without a mutilation? I never knew anybody who was happy quite; or who has not had to ransom himself out of the hands of Fate with the payment of some dearest treasure or other.—Pendennis.

The True Irish Shamrock.

In Ireland only one shamrock is known, says the American Notes and Queries. It is an indigenous species of clover, which trails along the ground among the grass in meadows. The trefoil leaves are not more than one-fourth the size of the smallest clover I have seen in America, and are pure green in color, without any of the brown shading of white and pink clovers. The creeping stem is hard and fibrous, and is difficult to dislodge from the earth. On St. Patrick's Day the true shamrock has to be searched out among the grass, for, though comparatively plentiful at that season, it grows close to the ground. Later it bears a tiny "whitey-brown" blossom. The information that shamrock is the Arabic word for trefoil may be of service to those interested in the origin of the Irish race. The word could have been introduced by the Milesians, or it may furnish an argument in support of the contention that one of the lost ten tribes of Israel settled in Ireland, which has been revived by the publication of a recent book.

Made a Mistake.

A few weeks ago a citizen called upon a well known athlete and engaged him to give lessons in boxing, and after a month the teacher said to his pupil:

"You are in good shape now, and you needn't be afraid to put up your hands with any of the boys."

Two days later the pupil returned with a pair of black eyes and a nose with the bark all off, and the instructor exclaimed:

"Great Scots, man, but you have been in a fight?"

"Yes."

"And got licked?"

"Yes."

"How was it?"

"Why, there was a fellow I wanted to lick. That's what I came here and graduated for. I met him yesterday and sailed into him, when—"

"When his crowd pitched into you?"

"Oh, no. I found I hadn't the sand. Indeed, I tried to run away, and he hammered Halifax out of me. You are a nice man!"

"What about?"

"To take my money and then get me licked!"

"Licked! Licked! Why, you rabbit, do you think learning how to box gives you sand? If you had only told me that you lacked grit and yet wanted to lick some one, I should have taken another tack. I should have taught you to sit on a high fence and punch him in the eye with a long fish pole as he went past."—Detroit Free Press.

John F. Cooper's display continues to attract much attention. To show the appreciation with which the Mathushek is held by those who recognize its merits, and that a Mathushek is the best piano to buy, he has sold twelve out of his exhibit, and taken orders for several styles he has sold out of since the Fair opened. These pianos are not "selected for purchase" in the dim future, but actually purchased and not yet delivered. Please take particular notice of this fact. Mr. Cooper expects to get the gold medal for finest exhibit in the fourth department.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. D. Bennett, an Insolvent Debtor.

J. D. Bennett having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. D. Bennett is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal, of the said J. D. Bennett, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 4th day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, Sept. 13th, 1890.

President Lincoln's Dream.

On the afternoon of the day in which the President was shot there was a Cabinet meeting, at which Mr. Lincoln presided. Mr. Stanton was late, and on his entering the room the President broke off in something he was saying, and remarked: "Let us proceed to business, gentlemen." Mr. Stanton then noticed with great surprise that the President sat with an air of dignity in his chair, instead of lolling about in ungainly attitudes, as his custom was, and that instead of telling irrelevant stories, he was grave and calm, and quite a different man. Mr. Stanton, on leaving the council with the Attorney-General, said to him: "That is the most satisfactory Cabinet meeting I have attended for many a long day. What an extraordinary change in Mr. Lincoln!" The Attorney-General replied: "We saw all that before you came in. While we were waiting for you he said: 'Gentlemen, something very extraordinary is going to happen, and that very soon.' To which the Attorney-General observed: 'Something good, sir, I hope,' when the President answered, very gravely, 'I don't know; I don't know; but it will happen, and shortly, too.' As they were all impressed with his manner, the Attorney-General took him up again. 'Have you received any information, sir, not yet disclosed to us?' 'No,' answered the President, 'but I have had a dream, and I have now had the same dream three times—once on the night preceding the battle of Bull Run, once on a night preceding such another—naming a battle not favorable to the North. His chin sank on his breast again, and he sat reflecting. 'Might one ask the nature of the dream, sir?' said the Attorney-General. 'Well,' replied the President, without lifting his head or changing his attitude, 'I am on a great, broad, rolling river, and I am in a boat, and I drift, and I drift—but this is not business'—suddenly raising his face and looking around the table, as Mr. Stanton entered. 'Let us proceed to business, gentlemen.' Mr. Stanton and the Attorney-General said, as they walked on together, that it would be curious to notice whether anything ensued on this, and they agreed to notice. He was shot that night.

Stud Poker.

But McDonald, a Denver sport, has told a reporter an interesting version of the origin of stud horse poker. "Poker," McCool and one Brady were the gamblers. Time: Before the war. Said Bud:

The deal was Brady's, and the first card had been given to each of them, when McCool wanted a card turned for another round of drinks. Brady turned it, and a four-spot fell to each. With a recklessness and gambling informality which had characterized the game throughout, McCool threw a large sum of money on the table, and Brady called it.

It seemed to be merely a bet before the draw, and the players tacitly understood in what manner it would be won or lost. McCool called for another card to be turned, and it was done. Each got a five-spot. McCool made an another addition to the pot, which Brady covered, and a third card was turned. Each got a six.

Up to this time the players had intended that, after deciding the question of drinks, the draw should be proceeded with; but now the game took another turn, and it was decided to settle the hands without drawing. The fifth card was accordingly turned, and it was a deuce.

There was an immense pile in the pot, and the interest among the crowd, which was packed around the table, was so intense, and the silence so deep that the ticking of the tall clock behind the bar sounded like a hammer striking on an anvil. Both men sat deeply absorbed in study. McCool's buried card was a six-spot, and he was certain enough that his pair had Brady beaten.

Brady's buried card was a trey, and he had a straight, and a sure thing. His credit, sitting behind that hand, was unlimited, and he was prepared to play it.

The betting proceeded slowly but heavily, until finally McCool had all his earthly possessions represented in the stake on the table, except two objects.

One of these was his stallion, who stood champing his bit on the street outside; the other was his old negro slave, who stood holding the horse. Finally, McCool ordered the negro to be brought in, and Brady deposited $2,000 against him, at the same time raising McCool $5,000.

After some moments of cool study, McCool told Brady that all he owned was on the table with the exception of his horse. He was willing to put him up against the last bet that Brady had made. The proposition was accepted, and McCool ordered the horse to be led in, and he was.

When the betting was at last over, and nothing was lacking to decide the game, but the appearance of the two buried cards, McCool called for a glass of liquor. It was not until he had emptied this that he asked to see his opponent's card.

When it was shown down he silently got up from the table and walked through the crowd, which had parted for his passage, out into the street.—Boston Herald.

As You Go Through Life.

Don't look for the flaws as you go through life;
And even when you find them
It is wise and kind to be somewhat blind
And look for the virtue behind them.
For the cloudiest night has a hint of the light
Somewhere in its shadows hiding;
It is better by far to hunt for a star,
Than the spots on the sun abiding.

The current of life runs ever away
To the bosom of God's great ocean.
Don't set your face 'gainst the river's course
And think to alter its motion.
Don't waste a curse on the universe—
Remember, it lived before you.
Don't butt at the storm with your puny form,
But bend and let it go o'er you.

The world will never adjust itself
To suit your whims to the letter.
Something must go wrong your whole life long,
And the sooner you know it the better.
It is folly to fight with the Infinite.
And go under at last in the wrestle.
The wiser man shapes into God's plan—
As the water shapes into the vessel.
—Ella Wheeler.

By the study of the latitudes and longitudes on the coast, one can see that the sun never sets on the United States. That has been called the glory of Great Britain, and was immortalized in one of the speeches of Daniel Webster. Now it is the glory of our own country, too. Since the purchase of Russian America, the farthest Aleutian island, stretching out toward Japan, is as far west of San Francisco as Eastport, Me., is east of San Francisco. If you will look at the map you will see that our republic extends through 196° of longitude, or more than half way around the world. When the sun sets on the Aleutian island, it is an hour high on the eastern coast of Maine, and both the setting and rising sun is shining on American citizens of the republic.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

Much has been written and said regarding Minister Mizner's action in the Barrundia affair. In such matters the proposition of sentiment must be discarded. There are fixed and decided laws between nations which govern the action of the representatives of all civilized countries. No matter what merit or demerit there may have been in Barrundia's case, the United States Minister had only one duty to perform. It was beyond his power or authority to give protection to Barrundia, and if he could not afford that immunity, then certainly the commander of an American vessel could not. Secretary Bayard, following the line of action of Evarts, Seward and Fish, and other illustrious diplomats, lays down the rule, that the government of the United States does not claim for its legations abroad any extra territorial privileges of asylum for refugees. The right of a foreign legation to afford an asylum for political refugees is not recognized by the law of nations as applicable to civilized or constitutionally organized States. During the insurrection in Hayti, the American Minister did extend protection to some of the refugees, and the then Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish, used this language to the Minister: "The right of asylum, by which I now refer to the so-called right of a political refugee to immunity and protection within a foreign legation or consulate, is believed to have no good reason for its continuance, to be mischievous in its tendencies, and to tend to political disorder. These views have been frequently expressed, and, while this government is not able of itself to do away with the practice in foreign countries, it has not failed, on appropriate occasion, to deprecate its existence and to instruct its representatives to avoid committing this government thereto." Our ministers, in some cases where there is an insurrection and no decided form of substantial government, have extended protection to the unfortunate, and when there has been no positive or authoritative demand made for their surrender, the government has acquiesced. This was the case in Hayti and some of the South American States. During an insurrection at Valparaiso, in 1859, when John Bigler, of California, was Minister to Chili, the American Consul extended protection to refugees, which caused an attack upon his house to enforce the surrender of the refugees. Mr. Bigler wrote Secretary of State Lewis Cass, that the English consulate had given asylum to refugees, which was submitted to by Chili, whereupon Cass expressed himself in favor of restoring the American Consul's exequatur, which had been recalled by the Chilean government.

While Washburn was Minister to France, in 1871, the Archbishop of Paris was seized by the order of the Commune, and thrust into prison to be held as a hostage. The United States Minister was appealed to by the Vicar General of Paris and the canons of the church, in the name of the right of nations, humanity and sympathy, to interpose his good offices in behalf of the Archbishop. Mr. Washburn, while he felt like exercising his authority as a diplomat, did not appeal to General Clauseret who was in command, as an official, but as an individual, only in the interest of humanity, to have the Archbishop relieved from arrest and confinement. This line of action was futile of any good results, for the Archbishop and a number of other distinguished hostages were taken from their cells the next morning and murdered. If ever there was a time when this power of asylum and protection should have been arbitrarily asserted, this was the time. We cite these cases in order to show that Minister Mizner did all that he had power to do in the Barrundia case. He could not protect him if he wished to, neither could Commander Pitts have afforded protection. The appeal of the authorities to the American Minister for the right to take Barrundia from the vessel, was only an act of courtesy to the country. The authorities had the right to take him at their will, even against the order of the American Minister. Mr. Mizner simply told Captain Pitts that the Guatemalan authorities could take Barrundia despite his objections. But for humanity sake, Mizner requested that no harm should come to Barrundia, and that he should have a fair trial, all of which was agreed to by the authorities. Barrundia, evidently, feared that there would be retributive justice, and that he would be dealt with as he had treated others during the exercise of arbitrary power, and actuated thereby, sought death by assaulting the authorities. There is no possible blame attaching to the American Minister. There is no foundation for the idea that the American flag has been insulted. Barrundia had no right to the protection of the flag—neither could the American flag shield him under the laws of nations and the established doctrine of the United States. A strict non-interference in such matters is the rule of this country, and the only possible error that could be urged was interceding for the refugee. He should have allowed Captain Pitts to assume the whole responsibility—at least waited until the officer asked for instructions. We apprehend the Department of State will approve the course of our Minister.

The Postoffice Department develops some queer facts, particularly the "dead letter office." Over six million pieces of mail matter are annually sent to this department. Twenty-eight thousand contained money amounting in all to $48,642.00. Four thousand had inclosures of postal notes in small sums under $5, aggregating $5,300. Twenty-seven thousand were found to contain drafts, checks, notes, commercial paper, etc., in the sum of $1,471,871.00, while forty-eight thousand contained paid and canceled obligations, receipts evidencing payments of money, deeds, mortgages, general miscellaneous papers, etc. Forty-two thousand contained photographs, one thousand contained articles forbidden to be transmitted through the mails; and eleven thousand upon being opened were found to contain lottery tickets, which, under the terms of the law, are declared unmailable. One hundred and sixty-two thousand contained postage stamps, and were inclosures to secure return answers to the correspondence which they accompanied, or were the remittances in payments of small balances, or accompanying orders for small purchases of merchandise, subscriptions, etc. Misdirections, incorrect, illegible, and deficient addresses are the leading causes for the failure to reach their proper destination. Letters opened and found to contain valuables are entered upon records, and if there is sufficient to identify the sender they are returned, if not, they are filed subject to reclamation upon proper application and identification. There is such a perfect efficiency now in our postal system that it is rare that any substantial loss occurs, except by the gross carelessness of correspondents themselves. If those who use the mails would take the trouble to conform to the plain requirements of the department, there would never be any loss. Of course letters and papers addressed to people sojourning in hotels and other resorts, who leave without giving their address, are a fruitful source of contribution to the "dead letter office."

There are things that change, and things that change not. The seasons change—the sun changes never. Both the changeable and the unchangeable are pleasing. On the other hand, fluctuations in the force which binds the earth to its orbit, or in that mysterious influence which regulates the electric fluid, would produce frightful consequences. The unchangeable has a stronger hold of the mind than the changeable; for the latter is transitory. It is as the summer garb of the earth to the solid globe itself, or as the evanescent clouds to the changeless canopy. The variable is pleasing where it is proper; the immutable is more than pleasing; it is venerable, impressive. Where firmness is demanded, fickleness is disgusting. Feelings may fluctuate, but shifting principles are inadmissible. Winds and waves may vacillate; but rocks and hills must keep their places, if they would preserve their dignity. How strong a grasp upon the mind have those vast symbols of immutability which nature presents. The ocean, rolling now the same as at creation's dawn, when it sounded its awful bass, harmonious with the anthem of the morning stars; the coral rock, lifting its moveless form above the changeful waters; the mountain summit, hoary with the snows of centuries, arrest the thoughts of short-lived man, and inspire him with awe. The works of man, like himself, are transitory. But few of the earlier monuments of his handiwork tower still above the whelming tide of time. But these few relics are invested with a peculiar venerableness. The tourist, visiting the remains of ancient art, where moldering columns, delapidated arches, and half buried temples speak in sepulchral tones of human mutability, experiences an awful sense of the Divine mingled with the human in mankind, when he comes in view of some sphynx, sarcophagus, or pyramid, which, through the ruinous ages, has stood and still stands unchanged. Note it, that man, so fickle himself, and so fond of mutations that it has been written of him—

"In nothing constant, but the Love of change."

Will travel with a pilgrim's fervor to remotest lands; will traverse burning sands, and brave all perils, to see a changeless thing. He will go to the dizzy home of the rock-goat, that he may stand with folded arms among the everlasting crags, and look down into chasms that yawn forever. Side by side, with the longing for immortality, has been planted in the soul of man the love of immutability. The immutability of the Deity, the immutability of truth, the immutability of goodness, the immutability of happiness—which is the guerdon of goodness. These grand ideas standing ever before the thoughtful mind, like the pillars of the universe, impart to man at once a sense of security; and they pledge him, by their sublime sanctions, to the cultivator of substantial qualities and the acquisition of a stable character.

Never discuss; you will convince nobody. Opinions are like nails; the harder you hit them the deeper they go.

There appears to be a wide difference in sentiment between the strong-minded women of Greece and their sisters of America. The former have just petitioned their king to give them the educational facilities afforded to his male subjects. "Fit us to rear our sons," they say, "and we will show you how much we can do for you and Greece." The American type, on the contrary, is inclined to regard the rearing of sons as an unworthy occupation, and says: "Give us the right to vote and hold office, and we will show you what politicians and statesmen we shall become."

There are few books which are so full of interest and entertainment to the casual visitor of an extensive library as its antiquated geographies—ponderous volumes, full of pretentious black letter wisdom and curious nonsensical illustrations, that must have severely taxed the credulity of even the credulous age for which they were made. The geographies of the middle ages were something far different from the compendious atlases of our day, containing accurate charts, maps and statistical tables. Their books were real world-descriptions, as they called them, and what the author did not know about the lands he wrote about, he imagined, and when his own imagination fell short he drew upon the imagination of others. There might have been more accuracy displayed in some of these accounts, had those who traveled themselves written down what they saw. But the discoverers of new shores were, for the most part, adventurers, who knew more about sailing and fighting than about writing, and who told their story perhaps to a village assembly, where it was taken up and passed from mouth to mouth, gaining much that was fantastic and imaginary, until it was finally seized upon and nobly expanded by some ambitious chronicler. We are told that King Alfred the Great, who gave a large estate in exchange for a book on geography, made valuable additions to the geographical portions of Orosius's history, which was translated by him, and that from the personal relations of two northern navigators, who came to the King, "he prepared a clear and concise statement of the northernmost countries from which the Saxon race sprang. He tells on their authority of the waste lands which the Fins inhabit, obtaining a precarious subsistence by hunting and fishing; of wealthy men whose possessions consisted of reindeer; of seas where the walrus and whale were in abundance; of Eastland and the Esthonians, where there are many towns, and where the rich drank mare's milk, and the poor and the slaves drank mead." Some of the original copies of these works of Alfred are still preserved, and prove that he was very well informed, and was careful and moderate in his statements.

THE BLACK MONK.

In the summer of 1884, while traveling in Southern France, Tom Bernard and myself, John Blackburn, found ourselves quartered in the sleepy little town of Vintgras. Stopping at the same hotel was Monsieur Rohan, a French gentleman, whose acquaintance we had made about a year before, in London. Recognizing us as old acquaintances he treated us affably, and took a deal of trouble in showing us about the neighborhood. One evening, when on the hotel balcony smoking, the question of the supernatural was introduced into the conversation.

"Well, gentlemen," said Monsieur Rohan, in answer to some remark which one of us had made, "you can say what you will, but with the experience of the supernatural which I have had, you will never make me believe else than that there are spectral influences at work in our very midst, operating alike for good and evil."

"Indeed!" Tom exclaimed. "Then you are one of the few fortunates who can number among their acquaintances a ghost or two."

"I did not say so," replied Rohan; "but my family chateau is undoubtedly visited, or haunted—call it what you will—by beings of another sphere."

"Oh, oh! monsieur," I exclaimed, "we are fortunate in having met you. We will visit this chateau of yours if you have no objection, and do our best to obtain an interview with these roving spirits. What say you?"

"Oh, by all means. I shall be delighted. If you like we will start to-morrow. The chateau is only 50 miles distant, and I am anxious to convince you."

"Agreed!" cried Tom and I together. "We start to-morrow."

In the evening of the next day we were again sitting smoking, but this time in the gardens of the Chateau Rohan. We had arrived early in the day, and had been well entertained.

The chateau was of ancient aspect, and situated in the midst of a beautiful, wooded country. A dry moat surrounded it and an antique drawbridge led to its main entrance.

Monsieur had no wife, nor, he said, somewhat cynically, did he want one; so when its owner was absent, which was pretty often, the place was left in charge of the old butler, Raoul Pascal, an eccentric old character, who seemed always wrapped in gloomy meditation.

Monsieur informed us that his chief spectral visitor was an old monk, who, in long black robes and deep, overhanging hood, paced from midnight to dawn the corridors of the chateau; and who when followed always disappeared in a bedroom in the left wing, called, through being hung with green tapestry, the green room. As a natural result of its ghostly character the portion of the house in which this room was situated had been kept in disuse for years. Monsieur and a friend had once slept in the green room. About midnight the Black Monk appeared; and Monsieur frankly confessed that he and his friend at once fled in their night-robes to the inhabited portion of the chateau, followed in their flight by the mocking laughter of the specter.

We sat smoking in the beautiful gardens of the chateau until twilight stole over the land; then, after we had partaken of a light supper, we were shown to our bed-room for the night, the mysterious green room, by monsieur himself. Passing through some stately corridors, we entered the left wing, and at the end of a long, dismal-looking gallery, came upon the haunted room. Bidding us pull vigorously the old bell-rope which we would find hanging by the bed, if any danger threatened us during the night, monsieur shook hands with us and bade us good-night, and soon the echo of his retreating footsteps died away in the old gallery and we were alone.

Entering the room, we found it was of moderate dimensions. In one corner was a bed of ponderous appearance, covered with a heavy canopy, and scattered about the room were a couple of small tables and a few heavy, antique chairs. At one side of the fire-place stood a large oak cabinet, which on opening we found quite empty. On the other side of the fire-place, standing in a recess, was a life-size oil painting of a cavalier of the time of Henry II of France. The room had been well dusted and a fire lighted by order of monsieur and in the dim firelight the green tapestry with which the walls were hung gave the place quite a spectral appearance. The curtains of the only window in the room were closely drawn—a useless precaution, for the window panes were so thickly covered with dirt that curtains were practically unnecessary.

"Well, Jack," said Tom, as we placed our candles on one of the tables, after having made the inspection of the room, "the place does certainly look rather ghostly; but as neither of us believes in rubbish about specters and goblins, I vote that we go to bed at once and get a good night's rest."

"You may if you like, Tom," I replied; "but I intend to sit up a little longer and give the Black Monk a fair chance of obtaining an interview with one of us." "Bah! rubbish! I thought you had more sense, Jack. However, do as you like; I'm off to bed. Good-night."

So speaking, Tom, who, while we were talking, had been rapidly divesting himself of his clothing, sprang into bed and was soon fast asleep.

Pouring out a glass of wine from a bottle which we had brought with us, I sipped a little; then, blowing out one of the candles, I lit a cigar and sat down close to the fire, so that I might puff the smoke up the great, wide chimney. As I sat and smoked, my thoughts became centered on the Black Monk. The time, the circumstances and the place, invited meditation, and I sank into a reverie. What if, after all, disembodied spirits roamed at times upon the earth? However improbable, from a materialistic standpoint, the idea cannot be dogmatically termed impossible. Millions of human minds believe with a shrinking dread in the conception, and though those minds may by the philosophical be termed vulgar, still, judged by a theory of environment, the wide-spread belief might establish the fact. Pondering thus I became entirely wrapt in thought on spectral phenomena, and letting my half-consumed cigar fall unheeded at my feet, I became dead to my surroundings.

I was aroused at last by the chiming of some distant clock, and looking at my watch I saw that it wanted a quarter to twelve. The candle burned low, and feebly glimmered in the darkness. The flickering firelight cast weird, fantastic shadows on the tapestry. No sound was audible but Tom's heavy breathing from the bed. I tried to rise to snuff the candle and disrobe for bed, but an undefinable feeling of dread chained me to my seat. Moved by some mysterious influence, I kept my eyes fixed upon the recess, in which stood the old painting of the cavalier.

Heavens, there is something there! What is that dark shape standing within the gloom?

It approaches; a clammy sweat breaks out upon me; I am dumb and powerless.

Slowly emerging from the gloom of the recess, the shape took more distinct form, and I recognized it in the original of the picture in the recess. With a long crimson cloak falling gracefully from its shoulders, the phantom stood looking down upon me. Its features were white and ghastly, and as it bent a pair of black, piercing eyes upon me, I shrank in terror from the awful expression they conveyed, for within their depths there seemed to burn lurid fires.

Though the very marrow of my bones seemed to be freezing with terror, I at last with an effort rose to my feet, and clutching the back of my chair for support, gasped, in a low, hoarse tone:

"Speak! Who art thou that in the dead hour of night sets nature's laws at naught, and with thy ghostly presence affrights men's sight? If thou art indeed a spirit, and hast the power of speech, end this awful silence; else shall my already twisted reason fall like shattered glass."

For a moment the ghost seemed to hesitate, then with a commanding gesture it waved me toward the recess. Under the influence of those terrible eyes, and with a death-like chill at my heart, I obeyed its motions and stepped into the shadow of the recess, all the while keeping my eyes fixed upon the phantom's face. Gradually its ghastly features assumed a warning look, and it seemed as if about to speak, when again the chiming of a distant clock came floating on the night air. It was midnight. As the chimes ceased, the ghost assumed a listening attitude, while a somber frown overcast its face; then, as if startled, it suddenly turned, and stalked away into the gloomy shadows which hover darkly at the far end of the room.

Giving vent to a low, hysterical cry, I was about to rush forward to the bed and awaken Tom, when a faint, creaking sound drew my attention to the oak cabinet, which stood on the other side of the fire-place. Its heavy, paneled door was slowly opening.

What was coming now? What fresh horror was I to witness? To add to my terror, the candle, with a sputter, went out, and from the partly opened door of the cabinet issued a deep crimson light.

Slowly the cabinet door swung wide open, and standing on the threshold, holding aloft a brazen lamp, from which issued a fiery glare, there appeared to my wondering gaze the vision of the Black Monk.

When the first crimson flash issued from the cabinet I shrank behind a curtain which hung loosely in a corner of the recess, and could therefore, I thought, see without being seen; unless, indeed, the eyes of spirits could see through things material as we see through glass. The face of the Black Monk I could not see, the hood of his long black gown completely covering it. In the hood were two eyelet-holes, through which, as he swung the lamp above his head, he seemed to be cautiously surveying the apartment. Once the eyelet-holes were turned in the direction of the recess, and a pair of fierce, glittering eyes peered through them at my hiding place.

As I raised my hand to draw the curtain more over me, I felt the butt of a revolver which I always carried with me when traveling, pressing against my breast. Stifling an exclamation of joy, for until then I had forgotten all about it, I drew it forth and awaited further events.

Slowly the dread figure of the Monk emerged from the cabinet, and with noiseless, stately steps advanced to the bed. For some moments it stood looking down upon Tom, who was still slumbering heavily; then it hissed in French, and in a low, harsh tone:

"Rash impulsive fool, this night shalt thou solve indeed the mystery of the grave. Why couldst thou not leave me alone, with the gloom, the shadows and my own sad memories? But thou hast dared to raise the Black Monk's mystic veil; receive now in thy bosom the Black Monk's kiss."

Thus speaking, the Monk with a rapid movement, drew a long, antique dagger from beneath his gown, and, before I had time to utter a cry or move a hand, drove it into the breast of Tom.

There was a low, choking cry from the sleeper, the dagger, dripping with blood, was again raised aloft, and then two loud reports from my revolver rang through the room.

As I rushed with vengeful fury from my concealment, the monk, with a hoarse groan, sank bleeding on the floor, clutching, in his agony, the heavy drapery of the bed. Rolling from his nerveless grasp, the lamp went out, and black darkness hid all from view. Grouping nervously, though rapidly, around the bed, I seized the bell-rope which monsieur told us to pull in case of need.

"Help! Murder! Lights there! Lights! I shouted pulling furiously at the rope.

Listening for a moment I could hear the pealing of the bell I had set in motion echoing along the silent corridors of the chateau. A few moments' dead silence ensued, and then there was a rush of many feet along the gallery, and, followed by attendants bearing lights, Monsieur Rohan dashed into the room.

"Mon Dieu!" he cried, as his eyes took in the scene before him. "What is the meaning of this bloody mystery?"

"It means," I grasped, "that I have slain the Black Monk; but—oh, Heaven—not before he had killed my friend."

"Quick!" cried monsieur to his attendants. "Two or three of you convey this gentleman on the bed to my room at once, and some of you hurry for doctor Laranche. We may yet save his life."

Before following the unconscious form of poor Tom, I stooped and tore open the hood of the Black Monk. "Confusion!" I cried, as I did so.

"The devil!" exclaimed monsieur; and we both peered, thunderstruck, at the face beneath the hood; for in those pallid features, with the blood trickling from the corners of the shrunken mouth, we recognized the face of Raoul Pascal, monsieur's gloomy butler.

"Take him away, and let him be seen to," said monsieur to the remaining attendants. "The old fool has been more than eccentric—he has been mad."

We next closely inspected the old cabinet, and found that it was connected at the back with a long, narrow passage that led to the room which the butler had occupied for years.

Neither Tom nor the Black Monk died of his wounds; and at the end of a month his monkship was sent to a respectable lunatic asylum, while Tom and I remained until the autumn, the guests of Monsieur Rohan. As for the phantom cavalier, when I gave monsieur and Tom a full account of my night's adventure, monsieur looked grave and shook his head; but Tom merely laughed, and said I must have fallen asleep and dreamt about the old picture, and in my sleep, perhaps have walked into the recess, to be aroused by the opening of the cabinet door. That this was so, I cannot believe; and in spite of our discovery of the fraudulent character of the Black Monk, I am now inclined to think that we in this materialistic age, are too prone to dismiss the question of the supernatural with an empty laugh or heedless sneer, and not to give the subject that serious consideration which it naturally claims. Of course, whether there are more things in this fretful world than we dream of in our philosophy, is not for a poor scribbler such as I to say; but you have my story—make the most of it.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Miss Clementina de Vere, soprano in Dr. Paxton's church in New York, receives $4,500 a year for her services. This is said to be the highest salary paid to a choir singer either in America or Europe.

In his eighteenth year Weber was conductor of an orchestra at a Breslau theatre. This was about 1804. Life was more precocious in those days. Sarah Jennings, Duchess of Marlborough, exercised a marked influence on society in her sixteenth year. Richelieu shone in the salons in his fifteenth. Mendelssohn at twelve was the delight of Goethe, and Beethoven at fifteen was an official court organist.

The World's Fair is the name of the new extravaganza by Paul M. Potter, author of The City Directory. It opened the season last Tuesday at the Broad-street Theatre, Philadelphia, being there presented by Rice's Surprise Party for the first time on any stage. It tells the story of Christopher Columbus and his imaginary visit to the Exposition of 1893, and conducts the audience through many departments of the fair, showing the national characteristics of each.

Actor Billy Florence and the Prince of Wales happened to be alone together on the grand-stand at the Ascot races. The Prince offered the popular American a cigarette, and they lighted up. Forthwith Florence looked earnestly around on the vast gathering so intently that the Prince asked what the matter was. With delightful candor Florence is said to have replied: "I was only hoping to find some American, your highness. I'd like every American here to see me smoking a cigarette with you, because it would be such a capital advertisement at home, but there's not one in sight."

The German papers are making merry over the extravagant nonsense which "special correspondents" at Oberammergau are writing about the profits of the play. It appears that, so far from the profits in 1880 having been 600,000 marks, as stated in the Standard, they were only 240,000 marks, which sum had to be divided among 700 persons. The net profits this year (estimated at 1,000,000 marks) cannot possibly exceed 250,000, reckoning that there will be a return of 20,000 marks from each of the 25 performances, as there is a deficit of 250,000 marks to be paid off, which sum has been expended on the new theatre, the scenery and the costumes. The question of abolishing the play has never arisen at Oberammergau, and if the performances are stopped after this year, it will be in consequence of the interference of the Bavarian Government, as the Prince Regent Luitpold does not approve of them.

Henry Mapleson has written from Vichy to the Paris Figaro, denying that he and his wife, Marie Roze, were ever really or legally married. Though ostensibly praising Marie Roze as an amiable woman and fine singer, he writes that she never was his wife; that though a form of ceremony had been gone through, it has been declared illegal, and Marie Roze is as free to marry again to-morrow if she chooses to do so as he is. In his letter Mapleson pointedly refers to the fact that he has bought Marie Roze many valuable presents, and procured her profitable engagements. Marie Roze cannot dissolve their marriage, he says, by means of her pending divorce suit against him for infidelity, because there never was any marriage. As Mapleson has always introduced Marie Roze as his wife, both here and in America, and she has children by him, this letter is likely to cause much surprise. Marie Roze's version of this startling story has not yet been obtained, as she has just gone to Scotland for a month. Her sister was seen, however. She was much surprised and shocked when shown Mapleson's letter. She said she could not talk about the matter without her sister's authority. The reporter observed that Mapleson would hardly make such a bold statement if he believed that Marie Roze could prove a marriage. The sister replied that she believed Marie would have no trouble about that phase of the case. The sister admitted the separation between Mapleson and Roze and Madame Roze's suit for divorce, which, she said, was due to a lapse on Henry's part which Marie could not overlook. Henry Mapleson is the son of Colonel Mapleson, known for some years as a commander-in-chief of her Majesty's operative forces on this side of the Atlantic. He was first brought into prominence through his position as the husband and manager of Marie Roze, who, at that time, held a good position in the musical world. Marie Roze's life has been an interesting and in part a sorrowful one. She was sacrificed at an early age, and entered the Conservatory of Music in Paris when 15 years old, in 1864. She made her debut at the Opera Comique in August of 1866, in Herold's opera Marie, and immediately conquered public favor. By her grace, refinement and excellent rendition of each role undertaken she won, in fact, an unrivaled position in the French capital. In 1869 she appeared in the Paris grand opera in Gounod's Faust. She afterwards appeared in Italian opera in London. During her stay in London, which was from 1871 to 1876, Marie Roze married (in 1874) Mr. Jules Perkins, an American artist attached to Drury Lane, where he sang Bertram in Robert le Diable, and other bass roles. He died after a short married life of seven months, in consequence of a cold resulting in rheumatism of the heart, at the age of 29 years. Marie Roze afterward joined the Carl Rosa Opera Company in England, and sang Carmen and other roles in English. She then came to America, and it was then announced that she had been married to Henry Mapleson.

Book Chat.

Zola's wife never reads any of her husband's literary productions. Neither does Swinburne's; Swinburne is a bachelor.

We are warned that Stanley's lectures will come high. They will also likely be very dull. But they will of course be well patronized.

"I tell all young people," wrote Dr. Johnson, "and tell them with great sincerity, that nobody who doesn't rise early will ever do any good." Meanwhile in his diary, April, 1765, he confesses to a general habit of lying in bed himself until 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Epigram, primarily, is a Greek word, and signifies an inscription. In literature, it is usually understood to mean something sharp and short, generally stated in a terse rhyme. Martial, a Latin writer who was famous in that line, says:

An epigram is like a bee—a thing
Of little size, with honey and a sting.

Rudyard Kipling's literary status has at last been clearly defined. He is the priggish young cockney who travels incog. in the United States and then goes off 3,000 miles and makes faces at American journalists. And yet, young Kipling has given no salient indication that he is a second edition of Charles Dickens outside of his calf binding.

Mrs. I. B. Shipley, of London, claims to have detected in Mr. Bellamy's Looking Backward "a marvelous resemblance to the work of the prominent German Socialist and member of the Reichstag—August Babel—whose book, entitled Woman in the Past, Present, and Future, embodies the entire practical structure of modern Socialism, which Edward Bellamy has appropriated. When Looking Backward first came out, we called attention in an extended article, that the work was not original, and cited authorities.

Of the "Kreutzer Sonata" M. Zola has this to say: "The book is the work of an imagination which has become diseased. In many respects, however, it is a sign of the times, a symptom of sickness. This sickness is a continual craving and undefined longing—a feeling that something is wanting to our repletion; but what exactly that something is not even those who are the most conscious of the void can determine. The promise held forth by the beginning of the century has been belied. I do not say this in respect to science, for science has achieved great and glorious things, but even the great stages of its onward march are insufficient to content us. Humanity wants that which science cannot give. It cries in anguish for something human, something which appeals to its human instincts, its loves and fears, its joys and sorrows, its hopes and its despair, its impulses and passions. The clubs of 1848 were one outcome of this universal longing for an indefinite blessing. Socialism is another. And yet another, of a totally different character, is the literary decadence and parrassianism of to-day. I could multiply examples, but none could be more striking than the 'Kreutzer Sonata.' That book is the cry of the nation, of the heart of the nation, against the head, whose cold reasonings are not in sympathy with its human instincts and impulses."

Professional Chat.

A lawyer's life can be said to extend over a brief period. To be brief-less is to die.

Exasperated Judge, whose patience has been sorely tried both by the plaintiff and defendant—"My chief regret is that I can't decide against both sides."

Justice Bradley, of the United States Supreme Court, amuses himself making calendars. This is certainly a contrast with his judicial duties, particularly if they are comic almanacs.

Judge (to thief)—"Why didn't you take the bag of coppers together with the rest of the money?" Thief—"Well, yer see, Jedge, the law don't compel us to take more'n twenty-five coppers at one time."

"How do you like your new minister, Cora?" asked her father. "Oh, he's just splendid. He draws twice as large congregations as the Rev. Mr. Oldwun, whom he succeeds." "I suppose he is much more eloquent and impressive than Mr. Oldwun?" "N—no. He is rather an ordinary and tiresome speaker; but he's young, handsome and unmarried." "Oh, yes; I understand," said her father. "The increase in the congregation is made up wholly of young women."

A Judge of the Court of Appeals—the court of last resort in New York—will be elected this year. The Republicans have endorsed the Democratic nominee, Robert Earl, on account of his eminent fitness for the place. He has served in it for a long term of years, and it would have been useless to have nominated any one against him. It is about the situation here. The Democrats are not likely to nominate any Superior Judges, which is a compliment to the Republican choice.

Justice Bradley, of the United States Supreme Court, does not remember his first fee as a lawyer. "I did," he says, "a lot of small jobs before I got big ones. I taught while I was in college, and while I was studying law at Newark, N. J., I edited for a short short time a newspaper there. I was sent by it to Trenton as its correspondent, and there by reporting the Legislature, I acquired a good acquaintance with men all over the State, which helped me in my practice. I practiced at the bar thirty years, and I was admitted in 1840."

Daniel O'Connell, the great Irish orator, was forever making enemies by his fiery speeches. He at last was challenged and fought one duel, which, for private reasons, he determined should be his last. Being challenged again, he refused to meet his opponent on the plea that he had a wife and daughter who were entirely dependent upon him for support. His decision suggested this capital epigram:

Some men with a horror of slaughter,
Impose on the Scripture command,
And honor their wives and their daughters,
That their days may be long in the land.

The death of Judge Heydenfeldt calls to mind an anecdote of his son's application for admission to the bar. Young Heydenfeldt applied, was examined and rejected by the court. The next term of court he came before the court again, although there was a rule that no rejected candidate could apply so soon. He was, however, granted a hearing, and again he was refused admission. Nothing daunted, when the court convened at the next succeeding term, young Heydenfeldt was again on hand, and being met by one of the other Judges, who said to him: "Hello, Sol, what are you doing here again?" Sol replied, "Oh, going to try again to get in." "Well," said the Judge, "don't you know you have been rejected twice in three months, and it is not likely the court will admit you so soon thereafter?" This statement did not daunt the young man in the least, for he replied: "That's all right. Dad says this Court never did decide a case three times alike, so I have a chance."

Senator Hearst is said to be a great winner this year on his horses—sufficient to meet all election expenses for five years.

"Who wrote the Psalms?" asked the superintendent severely. And then a little girl in the infant class began to cry: "It wasn't me, sir," she said.

The great German Field Marshal, Von Moltke, is now 90 years of age. He, next to Bismarck, is the most revered person in Germany. It is proposed, on his 90th birthday, this year, to celebrate the same by extending national testimonials to the great military chieftain.

It is not generally known that excessive palpitation of the heart can be promptly stopped by bending double, with the head downward and the arms pendant, so that temporary congestion of the upper part of the body is produced. If the breath be held at the same time the effect of this action is hastened.

That was a just and timely measure of Congress, to grant Mrs. Jessie Benton Fremont, widow of the "Pathfinder," a pension. From recent reports she was sorely in need of assistance, as General Fremont died very poor. With all his golden opportunities General John C. Fremont did not lay up anything for a rainy day.

Ever since the Maine election, the Democratic newspapers have been busily engaged in killing off Blaine with the "Noon faced tyrant." It was a bitter loss, and they seek to make the only use left, that is to defeat Blaine, by trying to make it appear through some process of calculation, that Blaine and Reed are enemies and rivals. The more our Democratic friends try to belittle Blaine the greater he appears.

The proposition of some political economists for the deportation of the colored people of the South, to Africa, is impracticable and un-American. It is about as chimerical as the scheme for the return of all Irish-Americans to Ireland. The colored problem must find some other means of solution than deportation. While we must acknowledge that our voting population ought to be diminished in many respects by circumscribing much of the ignorant foreign element, still this is not one of the ways.

The published statements do not show the real reduction in our national debt, so far as it is a burden to tax-payers. In August, by way of illustration, the official decrease was only $53,000, but the interest-bearing debt was reduced by nearly $20,000,000 in the same month. The use of idle money to pay off the debt that bears interest is a great lightening of the burdens of the nation. The Funded Debt Commission of this city seems to think it is a good scheme to use the public money to pay off non interest bearing obligations. There is a wide difference in the policy of the nation and that of this city.

There is more good wine made at the present than in any former period of the world's history, but, relatively to those who can afford it, there is many times less. For one cellar fifty years ago, there are fifty or a hundred now, owned by liberal if uninstructed persons, whose hospitable instincts outrun their discrimination, wherefore they pour wine of high price and good vintage without stint before it has reached maturity. It may be safely asserted that three parts of the best wine is consumed before age has developed its virtue, mellowed its erudity, and allowed the hurtful acids to be transformed into the beneficent and palatable ethers which constitute the charn of a fine wine. Of another sort is the host who fondly imagines that all old wine must be good. Often it happens that the fathers have laid down what was originally good liquor, and by the self same fluid, quantum mutatus ab illo, the children's teeth are set on edge. Who does not writhe at the recollection of a bottle of Madeira being passed round, specially recommended by the host as having been sent twice round the Cape "by my father, Sir, and worth now a guinea a glass," but, alas! faded into an acrid liquid that it is hard to imagine ever flowed from the veins of the vine? Or perhaps a flask of Stygian hue is circulated—"20 port, my boy; precious little of that going nowadays!" and you are bound to fill and refill your glass, wondering the while at the Pantagruelian palates of Georgian bucks, who were wont to slake their thirst with what suggests to your degenerate taste a compound of Harvey sauce and treacle. All this while Amphitryon, as he contemplates complacently the revolving decanters, is sipping the weak whisky and water to which he is limited by the advice of his physician.

The recent orders from the Secretary of State, sending cruisers to the seal districts, has a snap of business. It means that all poachers will be seized and brought into American ports despite the lion's roar.

There has been an epidemic of marriages this week. Eros pierced eight hearts in one day as evidenced by the union of unions. Four weddings in one day is a pretty good return for the Elfin god. He took a wide range, from the highest department of State to pretty little sales girl.

That was a generous condescension of the Mormon President Woodruff, that he would obey the law in relation to polygamous marriages. Well, "Woodie," Uncle Sam has a summary as well as emphatic way of forcing obedience. Woodruff's manifesto publicly declares that the Later Day Saints must refrain from contracting forbidden marriages.

The Pillsburg Dispatch, an independent paper, criticises the utterances of the San Francisco Alta on the tariff question, which discloses the fact that the Alta did not know what it was talking about: "Novel information about the new tariff bill continues to come in from all parts of the country. The Alta California has learned that the iron and steel industry of New England is destroyed by a tariff increase of $4.75 a ton on foundry iron; forge iron, $3.50 per ton; scrap iron, $4.54 per ton; Bessemer iron, $5.50 per ton." If the esteemed Alta can designate the sections in which these increases of the tariff are made, it will demonstrate itself to be in possession of exclusive and important information.

The complications of politics, particularly municipal politics, are prolific in dangerous results. In cities of any considerable population the least intelligent are often placed over the destinies of the municipality. Frequently, too, ignorance and knavery are combined in the officers of these municipalities. In a majority of these cases these irresponsible and unqualified persons are either non-Americans, or indebted to the vicious non-American vote for their positions of power and influence. There is only one way to remedy such evils, and that is in the union, for municipal purposes, of the intelligent and good citizens—those in favor of an economical and proper government. Public welfare in such cases is always in advance of any partisan motives or victory.

The Laugh.

There is no laughter so musical, none so innocent, none so evidently spontaneous as that of little children. The grimmest misanthrope must admit its charm. As we grow older, though we be still of hilarious tendencies, there is no longer any music, or only of the tongs and tin-kettle kind, in our cachinnations. Some of us, and they, perhaps, not the least genial, having realized how literally true is Schiller's "Ernst ist das Leben," find a difficulty in getting out any vocal hilarity at all. We may be laughing inwardly, but the sound we are capable of emitting is the mere ghost of what we could compass in earlier years. Others, again, carry their risibility with them into extreme old age. Tottering on the verge of their final exit, they yet laugh with the loudest. It is partly hereditary, this patriarchal guffaw, for a laugh is sometimes handed down from father to son, like a nose or a sneeze. Carlyle mentions that he himself enjoyed an inheritance of this nature, and this no doubt accounts in a great measure for his intolerance of those to whom an audible expression of mirth has been denied. Had he been one whose utterances, cachinnatory and other, were not habitually made with all pedals down and all stops out, we should belike have heard nothing of the moral depravity and hopeless prospects of the man who cannot laugh. And the laughter of maturity, is it, after all, so very lovable and grateful to the ear? Mark attentively the notes of merriment as they issue from a middle-aged larynx. Is it possible that this succession of short barks, this alternation of gasps wheezings, really denotes an irrepressible gaiety within? Are these horrible distortions of a responsible householder's features, in sober truth, a sure sign that he is vastly amused? If so it be, then they, the fountain of whose mirth is hermetically sealed, are not wholly without consolation.

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that, for getting on in the world, a cheery laugh is a valuable ally. We are apt to think well of, and to befriend, if necessary, the man who never fails to see the point of our witticisms, and gives loud and hearty evidence of his appreciation. A grave man is a bore; to be taciturn and uniformly serious, one should have no need of the world's good opinion or assistance. To sit in a gay company a dumb dog, unable to say good things one's self or to cackle melodiously or otherwise, at the good things of one's neighbors, is considered a crime, which no moral or intellectual virtues can expiate.

Political.

The campaign in this county is now formally opened. As well understood, the Republicans heretofore have taken no action, other than with regard to the procurement of a complete registration of voters, for the reason that that the Democratic Convention had not placed a ticket in the field.

The meeting of Republicans held Wednesday night for the purpose of effecting club organizations, and to make arrangements for the meeting on October 4th, that will be addressed by Col. Markham, was largely attended, and the interest taken is indeed gratifying.

The Democratic County Convention held on Thursday, nominated a partial ticket. The indorsement by that body of Judges Van Fleet and Catlin, the Republican nominees, for Superior Judges, was in good taste, and a matter of courtesy to be commended.

It is useless to conceal the fact by Republicans that the action of the Democratic Convention was characterized by wisdom, and that with regard to some of its nominees the Republicans had better keep their eyes wide open. If losses will be suffered on the Republican ticket they will be due to overconfidence—one of the most dangerous features in politics. It has very often occurred that a nominee presumed to have a walk-over has been badly defeated. This was strikingly exemplified in the defeat of Mr. Page for Congress by Colonel Budd, a few years ago. We seriously admonish the Republicans in this campaign to be on their guard, and believe that with particular attention to the details they can carry their ticket in the State and in this county, to a man.

It is a matter of gratification that the candidates who have been placed before the people by the conventions of both parties, are of such character that they command public respect, and that there will be no occasion for mud-throwing.

We have heretofore reviewed the nominations made by the Republican Convention. Of the gentlemen named by the Democratic Convention, the candidate for Sheriff, Capt. Ruhstaller, has been prominently identified with the business interests of this city for many years.

R. C. Irvine, the nominee for Assessor, is a partner in the firm of A. A. Van Voorhies & Co., and has been with that establishment for many years.

M. R. Beard, the candidate for County Clerk, ran once before for that office, and was defeated by a slight minority. Since, he was elected Superintendent of our City Schools, and served several terms. His administration of that office is not open to adverse criticism.

S. P. Maslin, the nominee for Auditor and Recorder, served during the administration of Governor Bartlett in a confidential capacity in the executive office, and is now filling the same office under Governor Waterman.

Prof. Bainbridge, the nominee for Superintendent of Schools, is the conductor of the Business College that bears his name, and he enjoys an excellent reputation as a practical educator.

George F. Bronner has heretofore filled the office of Public Administrator with satisfaction.

A. G. Winn is a pioneer resident of the county and is a surveyor too well known for any particular introduction to the people.

For Assemblymen there were named R. O. Cravens, formerly State Librarian; Matt F. Johnson, an attorney well known, and Gillis Doty, who represented the county in the 25th session in the Assembly.

Benjamin Bailey, the nominee for Supervisor from the country, in former years served in the same capacity.

W. A. Henry, the nominee for township Justice, will doubtless enjoy the flattering compliment of receiving without solicitation, the endorsement of the Republicans. He is invincible.

Upon examination it is estimated that there is yet nearly one-third of the voters in this county unregistered.

As a counter to the Democratic endorsement of Judges Van Fleet and Catlin in this county, the joint Republican Convention of Yuba and Sutter counties, nominated Hon. P. W. Keyser, Superior Judge. In those two instances the Judiciary has, indeed, been removed from partisanship.

Markham Brigade.

On Wednesday evening was formed the Markham Republican Brigade. A large and enthusiastic crowd of Republicans assembled at the Court House on this occasion. Joseph Steffens was elected President, and W. A. Anderson, Secretary. Rolls of membership were opened and extensively signed. It was resolved by the select committee, consisting of C. S. Houghton, W. H. Ennis, Tom Scott, J. O. Coleman, Dugald Gillis, Ed. F. Taylor and A. B. Sanborn, as follows: That, so far as possible, the organization conform to military regulation; That a Major be elected who shall have command of the brigade, and who shall have power to select one Adjutant and five Aid-de-camps for parade; that no less than six clubs or companies be formed in the city, each of which will organize itself and select its own Captain and two Lieutenants. All outside clubs are invited to join the brigade. Aside from the military organization it is recommended that there shall be elected a President, Vice-President, Secretary and Finance Committee (for special funds), which officers shall have charge of the business of the association.

It is proposed to make a short and vigorous campaign. The Sacramento Republicans are fully alive to the issues, and intend to roll up an old time majority for Markham and Reddick and the whole ticket.

First Burial at Sacramento.

There has been some dispute as to when and where the first burial was made in Sacramento. Doubtless some interments were made before 1847, from Captain Sutter's establishment, but no record was preserved of them. In 1873 the subject was considerably discussed in the local press, growing out of a statement that the first burial was of James McDowell, in 1848, but it is very evident that Major J. H. Cloud was the pioneer white man to inhabit the city of the dead here. The California Star, Samuel Brannan's paper, of August 14, 1847, contained the following notices of Major Cloud's death:

Died, suddenly by a fall from a horse, at Sutter's Fort, on the Sacramento river, on the 4th inst., Major J. H. Cloud, Paymaster U. S. Army. Major Cloud's numerous personal virtues, and his high character as a public officer, have endeared him to an extensive circle of friends both in and out of the service; and the news of his unfortunate death will excite a deep gloom among all who have ever known him.

THE DEATH OF MAJOR CLOUD, U. S. A.

As with all good men, the tidings of this young officer's death, wherever received, has produced more or less expression of feeling, even among those unadventured by an acquaintance; while it has plunged in the deepest gloom his wide-spread circle of acquaintances, who remember him with the warmest of attachment, and never otherwise than as a gentleman of finest talent, beloved by all with whom he associated, or was in any way connected. He survived but eight hours after the fall which occasioned his death. Major Cloud left Santa Fe, and came hither in the battalion of Col. Cook, of the command of Gen. Kearney, and was attached to the Paymaster's department.

At a meeting of the military officers stationed at Monterey, held August 14th, Col. R. B. Mason presided, and Lieut. William T. Sherman acted as Secretary. Appropriate resolutions were adopted in respect for the memory of the dead. Speaking of the circumstances of the death and burial of Major Cloud, a correspondent writes:

A detachment of the first New York regiment of volunteers, under Lieutenant C. C. Anderson, was stationed during the summer of 1847 at Sutter's Fort—most of the time within the fort. In July or August of that year Major Cloud, Paymaster United States Army, and Captain J. L. Folsom, Quartermaster, with a small military escort, visited the fort for the purpose of paying off the troops and looking after some government horses that had been left in charge of a settler on the Cosumnes, named Shaddin (Sheldon?). This business accomplished, they started on their return below by way of Stockton, and when about half a mile south-east of the fort Major Cloud's horse—a spirited one—slid at some object; the Major was thrown, or rather fell, from the horse, and never afterward spoke. He died in the evening, and was buried in the shadow of the old oak, where is now the New Helvetia Cemetery. Having had charge of the detail for digging the grave, the writer is positive it was dug in the shade. The Major died in a house just outside the walls of the fort, occupied by Mrs. Wimmer, who afterward attracted some attention at Coloma, as being the possessor of the first piece of gold discovered at the mill. At that time (summer of 1847) there were some five or six mounds at the old oak tree, having every appearance of being graves.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

A Midnight Bell, is booked for October 3d and 4th at the Metropolitan. This is said to be Hoyt's funniest production.

Last night Inherited was presented by Maude Granger and her company to a good house. Maude Granger is a splendid actress. She was one of that grand Diplomacy company headed by Montague, and which included such artists as Fred Warde, Shannon and Jeffreys Lewis. Miss Granger's rendition of Helen Carruthers cannot be excelled. Her artistic work in the second act was thrilling, emotional, grand, and her varied impulses and freaks aroused the enthusiasm and emotions of the audience. While the art work was great, the play itself left a melancholy feeling on all. There was no ranting or extravagance, but a dignified, impressive portrayal of a mind-stricken woman from the first freaks of a mind diseased until overtaken with frenzied madness. Chas. Mestayer was in place as the dignified Dr. Raymond. Harry Mainhall made a good Julian. Esther Williams has talent and did the limited work ascribed to her as Alice, in an artistic manner. Carrie Elborts with Charles Gray carried the comedy portion acceptably. Charley Gray is a Sacramento man, and formerly a member of the Capital City Minstrels, where he was a prime favorite in character delineations. His rendition of the Free American is not exactly in his line. He appeared on the house programme as Claude H. Brooke, having evidently assumed that as his stage name.

Inherited again to-night and to-morrow night The Creole.

The Women and Girls of Capri.

The Capri women work very hard in the fields as aids to builders, and especially as carriers. They transport everything, from a handkerchief full of figs to a Saratoga trunk, on their heads. But more astonishing still is the ease with which they carry a glass biretto full of wine, oil, or water, down the steep and slippery "goat paths" which do duty, with two really good exceptions, for roads at Capri. The woman first makes a round pad of a handkerchief, which she places on her head; on this the biretto—in shape something like a very large decanter—is poised, and off goes the fair faccina (portress) at a good pace. She does not think of using her hands to steady the bottle unless it is very large, or if she turns her head, or in going up or down a particularly high step; then she will touch the base of it with her fingers. The grace with which they manage this, to us, impossible feat, is charming. I have often stopped to watch them in delighted astonishment, and to ask if there is no fear of the whole thing tumbling down. The mere idea of such a catastrophe provokes much amusement.

And now we come to the Capri girls. Well, of course, they alone would furnish material for an article. There is something peculiarly winning about them. I do not think it is their beauty half so much as their frank, natural ways that please one. I have observed in them a simple fact, a sweet courtesy of manner, which would not disgrace a Duchess. Yet there is nothing studied, no effort; the attraction lies in their being so entirely unaffected:

"And being natural, naturally please."

This is made obvious by the fact that when a Capri girl is taken out of her original sphere she loses many of the winning qualities which so become her.

Ladies do not always perceive how taking these girls are. "I cannot understand how men, gentlemen by birth and education, are attracted by these common girls," is a very general remark. Why is it that ladies see no charm where men find so much? Can it be that simplicity and other of nature's graces have a certain mawkish flavor to our feminine palates? I hope not.

These girls can assume a wonderful amount of dignity when necessary. They have also an abundant supply of mother wit, which I have heard used advantageously to check the too ardent attentions of youthful forestieri.

One of the prettiest sights I know of is to meet a band of Capri girls aged from twelve to sixteen, returning from their day's toil. Here they come, with their skirts tucked up on one side, the red kerchief carelessly tied at the back of their shapely heads, from under which the dark, wavy hair escapes—cheeks flushed after hard work, eyes shining, tongues chattering. As they pass they look you straight in the face, smile merrily, and wish you "Buona sera," with audible comments on your personal appearance. But they are not difficult to please, and as long as you have an agreeable expression, the general verdict will be that you are "una bella signora."—The Cornhill Magazine.

Bibulous Boston.

"The method of drinking which has been adopted in Boston," said a commercial traveler in the Astor House yesterday, "is about the most extraordinary farce that I have ever known. It is impossible to get a drink anywhere in town unless one sits down at a table and be served by a waiter. All the big bar-rooms in the place have brass railings along the bars, behind which the bar-tenders can be seen busily at work, as though employed in prison cells. The thirsty mob of Bostonians sit at the tables without and growls at the law. So much drunkenness has not been known before in the town since it was discovered. The reason is natural enough. Men who drink steadily all wish to have their cocktails and mixed drinks made in a peculiar fashion. The bar-tenders understand this and half the pleasures of drinking in the American fashion is to be found in the acquaintanceship and care of a favorite bar-tender. All sorts of rough waiters have been pressed into service in Boston, and as the bar-tenders do not know who they are making drinks for things are run out in a slipshod, hasty and careless manner. Naturally Bostonians cannot afford to tip a waiter every time they drink, and so the custom has been adopted of not tipping the waiter at all. This acts hurtfully on the efficiency of the service. Again, when a man goes to the trouble of sitting down at a table, hanging up his hat, waiting fifteen or twenty minutes for a drink to be served him, he naturally concludes he had better take two or three drinks on the spot, and a large and effulgent area of inebriety is to be found in Boston town. Men go out to get a drink, sit down at a table, make a few trenchant remarks about the law, and finally drift off to a game of poker; whereas, under the old rule, they would hurry into a bar, toss off some stimulant, and have done with it for the day."—*N. Social Microbes.

Very good advice is often given to beware of bad associates, to keep one's self aloof from the dangers of moral contagion. That is a good rule to follow, but something more is needed, and that is to keep one's moral character in such good condition as to be proof against infection. Modern scientists have pursued the study of disease microbes with such diligence that they claim to be able to recognize the germs of certain diseases. They find them in the atmosphere almost everywhere, and they prove that these microbes are real germs of disease by their experiments with the lower animals. But along with these discoveries goes the other, that a thoroughly healthy man may breathe or swallow millions of these germs of disease without being infected. He cannot indeed altogether escape them. The sanitarian may reduce the risk of contagion by providing small-pox hospitals and homes for consumptives, and by teaching lessons of care in the home circle in treating and associating with patients known to be afflicted with contagious diseases, but after all precautions have been taken the healthy man will still be exposed to more or less contagion in his place of business, in public halls, in street cars and other conveyances, and even as he walks along the streets of a great city. He cannot put on a shield against these invisible disease germs, but he can fit himself, in a measure at least, proof against diseases of the contagious order, furnishing in his own person no nidus in which they may develop. To guard his physical well-being he needs protection from contagion as far as that can go, and he needs also the ability to withstand contagion when he can no longer avoid it. For his moral welfare he needs the same double guards. He should avoid evil communications and bad associates as he would the plague, but should also fit himself to resist their influence. There are social microbes no less potent and mischievous than those with which Pasteur deals. It is impossible to avoid them. Some of those who are affected with the contagion get put away in pest-houses and prisons; many more walk the streets, jostle one in the cars or in places of public meeting, or even visit us at our homes. They scatter about as they go the invisible germs of moral disease that, when they find congenial soil, flourish and grow, but perish in the presence of a high degree of moral healthfulness. While, therefore, it is well to avoid bad associates, just as it is well to avoid small-pox patients, it is also necessary to keep one's self strong enough to resist moral contagions that cannot be avoided. The influences that go to make character are in great part unseen, like the microbes that carry with them disease and death. The places where they most flourish may be known and avoided, but the influences themselves can not be altogether escaped. It is, therefore, of special importance that the young should be so trained as to resist such influences instinctively, which can be done if they are taught to be true, honest and self-respectful. The boy who respects himself, is proud of his good name, speaks the truth and deals honestly with his fellows, is in a measure proof against the unseen influences that break down character and lead to wrong-doing and to ruin. But he should not unnecessarily expose himself to contagion, and in that lies the value of many proverbs that warn him against bad associations and evil communications.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of R. S. McClure, an insolvent debtor.

R. S. McCLURE having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said R. S. McClure is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said R. S. McClure, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent, to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use. And the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. John W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 31st day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated Sept. 25, 1890

JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Caught in His Own Trap.

One of the most successful tricks of late years has been the "rope-tying trick" introduced as a spiritual mystery, but performed by many as a mere sleight-of-hand.

Along the sea-side, and at other popular resorts, in summer-time, men may often be seen tied up in apparently inextricable bonds, and releasing themselves, to the astonishment of a gaping crowd, or challenging some one to tie them up so that they cannot release themselves.

As one of these individuals was yelling away his general challenge, at Long Branch, an actor, who was strolling along, determined to have some sport and afford the loungers the opportunity of enjoying a little unrelaxed comedy gratis.

He accordingly stepped up to the man and, taking the rope, fastened him up thoroughly, using his own "tom-fool knot" to make all secure. When he had tightened the last knot he told the man to go ahead and get out of it. The fellow, with a swagger, began, but the rope would not give. He writhed and twisted, amid shouts of laughter, every shout making him work more furiously. Although the perspiration rolled down, it was no use. He would rest for five minutes, to get breath, then go at it again. After an hour's fruitless struggle he gave it up, and began to rave and shout at the top of his voice. Even this could not keep, and when he had quieted down and owned up that he was fairly caught, the actor released him.

Columbus and Isabella.

The women who are interested in the World's Fair show a natural disposition to emphasize the relation of Isabella, the Catholic of Castile, to the discovery of America. In some quarters this has evoked criticism, on the ground that Isabella was a very narrow-minded and intolerant sovereign, whose name is as closely associated with the promotion of the Spanish Inquisition as with the discovery of the new world. It is an adequate answer that her faults were those of her age, but her merit of faith in the bold discoverer of America was peculiar to herself. And, altogether, Isabella holds a high place among the crowned women of the world's history as a wife of irreproachable faithfulness, a sovereign of heroic enterprise, and a devout Christian according to her lights.

A statue of the Queen is projected, and Miss Hosmer is to visit Europe to study the costume of that age before executing it. We presume that personal likeness to the Queen is as much thought of as dress. It will be quite as hard to attain, for the "counterfeit presentments" of Isabella are very few. In fact there is but one trustworthy portrait of her in existence, and that was painted for a community of nuns to which she was greatly attached. When the monastery was dissolved they presented it to the noble house which had been their patron. From this original a copy was taken by one of the Spanish Commissioners to the Centennial Exhibition, who brought it to America with him and presented it to the University of Pennsylvania. It now hangs in the college chapel, and excites the wonder of the freshmen, who sit under it, as to the reason for a woman's likeness being found in the family portrait gallery of the university.—The American.

Origin of Muslin.

Muslin as it is now throughout the world, so from the earliest antiquity has been everywhere in Asia in favorite use an article of dress and as furniture. Its cloud-like thinness and its lightness were not the only charms belonging to the stuff. It was esteemed equally as much for the taste with which stripes of gold had been woven in its warp. As we learn from the travels of Marco Polo, the further all wayfarers in Asia wandered among Eastern nations, the higher they found the point of excellence which had been reached in weaving. Like many cities of Central Asia, Mosul had earned for itself a reputation of old for the beauty of its textiles. Cotton grew all around it in plenty, and the inhabitants, especially the women, were gifted with such quick feeling of finger that they could spin thread from cotton of more than hair-like fineness. It was a very natural thing, for the sake of euphony, to change the name mosul to that of muslin, a name by which the beautiful fabric of that ancient town has ever since been known.

Notice to Voters.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN TO ALL PARTIES interested, that at a regular meeting of the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento county, California, held on the 16th day of July, 1890, an order was duly made and entered, cancelling the Great Register of said county, and ordering a re-registration of the voters thereof. Said order was made pursuant to Sec. 1094 of the Political Code, and all persons desiring to vote at the next ensuing general election are notified that they will have to be re-registered, as provided in said section and in conformity with this order.

Attest: W. B. HAMILTON,

(Seal) Clerk of Board of Supervisors, Sacramento County, California. aug2

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting:
You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July, A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.
By L. P. SCOTT, Deputy.

R. M. CLARKEN, Attorney for Plaintiff. 9t—jy 26.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California, to J. H. Coghill and A. J. Coghill, greeting:
You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the clerk's office of said Court, on the second day of August, 1890, in which action John Ruedy is plaintiff and you are defendants. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, quieting title of plaintiff to the south 110 feet of Lot No. 5, and the south 110 feet of the east quarter of Lot 6, block bounded by D and E, and 6th and 7th Streets, in the City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, State of California, and directing defendants to appear and set forth their title. If any they have to said premises, and that defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim thereto, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of August, A. D., 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.
By L. P. SCOTT, Deputy Clerk.

MATT. F. JOHNSON, Attorney for Plaintiff. aug16—9t.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. D. Bennett, an Insolvent Debtor.
J. D. Bennett having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory, in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. D. Bennett is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal, of the said J. D. Bennett, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 17th day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, Sept. 13th, 1890.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

ISAAC JOSEPH, Attorney for Petitioner. 820

Seeking Information.

In some parts of the Southwest, regarding the great growth of towns and the building of school houses, says a Chicago Herald writer, it is still almost impossible to get a direct answer to a question. One evening about dusk a man rode up to a fence surrounding a lot near the roadside and thus addressed a woman who was attempting to persuade a few drops of milk from a muley cow:

"Madam, I am lost."

"Wall, that's whut the preacher says is the matter with the most of us, an' I reckon the best thing to do is to git 'ligion an' then do the best we kin under the circumstances," she replied, giving the cow an artful jerk.

"I mean that I have missed the road to Dabney's Ferry."

"Wall, I shouldn't wonder, fur it is a mighty matter fur some folks to foller these roads here, they air so crooked. You air travelin', I reckon?"

"Yes, I wanted to go to Dabney's Ferry."

"Got kin folks livin' down thar, I reckon?"

"No, I have no relatives living in this part of the country. Will this road lead me to the ferry?"

"Wall, you'll hatter ax pap about that. He tromps roun' all over the neighborhood, while I'm doin' the work, an' he oughter know whar all the roads go to."

"Where is he?"

"Who, pap?"

"Yes."

"Wall, Lawd only knows. But I reckon the yaller dog kin take you whar he is."

"Where is the yellow dog?"

"I don't know that nuther. You'll hatter ax one of the chillun."

"Where are the children?"

"The Lawd in heaven only knows, stranger, fur I don't. Jest wait awhile an' mebbe one of 'em will holler, for it's about time for one of 'em to git snake bit."

"I haven't time to wait."

"Wall, then, I reckon you'll have to jog along the best way you kin."

"I wish you would give me some information."

"Yes, I reckon so, fur I have hearn tell that information is a mighty fine thing when a pusson is pushed right hard fur it."

"Where does that road over there lead to?"

"Right to Dabney's Ferry."

"Why, that's the road I want. Why didn't you tell me?"

"Wall, you didn't ax me about that road. You kep' on talkin' about sithin' else. Wall, good day. Ef you travel roun' here much you'll l'arn to ax fur what you want without beatin' about the bush."

IF A BODY MEET A BODY

the result is a collision, whether "coming thro' the rye," or not. Life is full of collisions. We are constantly colliding with somebody or something. If it isn't with our neighbors it is with some dread diseases that "knocks us off the track" and perhaps disables us for life. Women especially it seems, have to bear the brunt of more collisions and afflictions than mankind. In all cases of nervousness, bearing-down sensations, tenderness, periodical pains, sick headache, congestion, inflammation, or ulceration and all female irregularities and "weaknesses," Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription comes to the rescue of women as no other medicine does. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be refunded. See guarantee on bottle-wrapper.

And so you say she is married?
Is married at last?
Well, I thought that her charms in that line
Were over and gone;
For her charms that we boys used to rave on
Are vanishing fast.
And the man has poor taste who would Choose her,
As sure as you're born.

She flirted three seasons with Harry,
And ages with Paul;
She the same as proposed once to Charley,
And likewise to me;
She has madly coquetted and flirted
With each and with all,
And however her schemes were successful
Ain't easy to see.

But who in the world is the victim?
I'm anxious to know,
It is said that all fools are not dead yet,
In this case it is true.
Why, Jack, what is it you tell me?
It surely ain't so;
And you say that the man that she married—
My goodness!—is you?

The "Profits" at Harvard.

An amusing bit of a story comes from Harvard, and is vouched for as genuine. A western business man, who had all his life heard of the University, and now that he had won money and leisure wished to see it for himself, recently went to Cambridge to visit it. He found one of the faculty who was willing to show him about, and together they "did" the institution with considerable thoroughness.

The visitor was much interested in what he saw, and asked a good many questions about the number of students, the terms of admission, and especially about the expenses. When he had seen all that there was time to show him, and all his other questions had been answered, he put the query which from his air it was evident he considered of great importance, and which showed how impossible it was for him to conceive of any great enterprise otherwise than as a scheme for making money.

"I am greatly obliged to you, professor," he said, "and there's just one thing more I'd like to ask you. Who gets the profits of this concern?"—Arlo Bates, in September Book Buyer.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

From indications at this writing the Republican meeting to-night, and the reception that will follow to Mr. Markham, the Republican candidate for Governor, will be one of the most noted in the history of this city with regard to political events. While the Civil War was in progress partisan feeling ran high, and popular demonstrations were very pronounced. Since there has been much of apathy, and the people have now come to the point of regarding the selection of public officers with concern only to the economical business administration of their affairs. It has been only of late years that a party has been dominated by a single individual, and the fact cannot be concealed that Mr. Buckley controls the destiny of the Democratic party in this State. We confess an admiration for the tact this man has displayed. With the infirmity of blindness, that ordinarily would relegate one to the background, he assumed the generalship in the Democratic politics of the city of San Francisco; following this advantage he has been able to place himself in a position to control the State Democratic Conventions, and to dictate the actions of legislators elected by that party. He has made his impress felt upon the Democratic party as a National organization. From a Republican standpoint, we repeat that we admire the man in one sense; we do not, however, approve of the subserviency by an important political organization that was so clearly demonstrated at the San Jose Convention. Mayor Pond, of San Francisco, is a gentleman against whom we have never expressed anything of adverse criticism, other than that he accepted the nomination for so important an office as that of Governor of the State from the hands of Buckley. It could as well have been, and perhaps in better taste, that he had permitted himself to receive a similar favor from Boss Tweed or John Kelly. On the other hand, it cannot be seriously charged that Colonel Markham will enter the Gubernatorial office with any collar about his neck. It is fortunate that the Republicans of this State can run their party without the dictation of a selfish boss.

With regard to political matters in this county, there are features that do provoke ridicule. The Republican party has placed before the people an exceptionally good ticket, and one which has received the endorsement of all the members of the party except a very few. There has been a very absurd attempt upon the part of a few interested politicians to infuse life into an independent movement, and the leading Democrats are in the condition of Barkis—"willin'." The great Democratic party of the county is about in the situation with Mr. Barkis, a character in Dickens' "David Copperfield." Barkis fell in love with a servant girl of the name of Peggotty, and solicited her in marriage in a voluminous correspondence, and always expressed himself as being "willin'." It happens in the present instance that Peggotty is "willin'" to a certain extent, but the trouble has been as to the division of the spoils, and this important consideration has delayed the marriage of Barkis and Peggotty. This matter reminds us very much of the past history of the Democratic party. It has always been willing to sacrifice principle for office. In 1872 there was an endorsement of Mr.

Greeley as a candidate for President of the United States; yet, as a matter of history, that gentleman throughout his life had steadfastly and conspicuously opposed the principles of the Democratic party. In this State we have witnessed a combination between the Democrats and what was known as the New Constitution party in 1879. There has been no time in the history of this government that the Democratic party has not been willing to make the most abject surrender of its principles if there could be accomplished the election of a portion of its ticket. The situation of affairs in this county to-day is that the Republican party is standing upon its platform; that it has presented to the people a complete list of candidates; that the nominees have been the objects of public criticism since July, and against no individual upon the ticket has there been an open charge made. The very fact that with three months of preparation by the opposition, nothing has been accomplished, indicates that the people are taking little stock in the building of a Frankenstein. We assume—know that the people will be just, and that they will regard the motives which prompt the actions of men and of parties. Confessedly the controlling motive now actuating the Democratic party and the independents, is to secure the election of certain gentlemen and the defeat of others; there is no principle behind it; nothing that should appeal to any who respect honesty and straightforwardness in politics.

San Francisco has heretofore been considered the stronghold of Democracy, but from information of a reliable character, it now appears that Markham will have the majority vote of the Bay city. There are a number of reasons for this conclusion. The party is not in unison, and the struggle against the Buckley rule is likely to result in favor of the Republican leader. It is an open secret, that unless Pond discards the Buckley influence, the reform element will vote Markham as the head of their ticket. Under the present situation Pond cannot renounce fealty to Buckley; thus he is placed in a position which must result disastrously in either dilemma. There is also a deep rooted feeling on the part of the labor element, against Pond, for his cold and heartless proclamation that "one dollar and a quarter per day is enough for the working man." This will throw the votes of hundreds of the poorer classes against him. There is nothing that strikes the heart of a laborer so strong as a slight such as the above. The Irish laborers are particularly hostile to Pond, and when we consider that a large proportion of those who reside in San Francisco, have always given allegiance to the Democracy, it must be self evident that Pond cannot carry his party vote in that city. The southern portion of the State is conceded to Markham. The signs of the times are that the northern counties will at least give their usual vote without much change. Hence it may be set down as a certainty that the Republican leader will be triumphant in the present contest.

The Congressional fight in the Second District seems to be largely in favor of Hon. Geo. G. Blanchard, of El Dorado. Judge Blanchard is an able and positive man. He has power and influence in what he says. Having devoted the major part of his life in the interests of his people, he knows their wants in the national legislature. Possessed of much magnetism, as well as an able and eloquent advocate, he will become a power in the House of Representatives. While there is a small Democratic majority in his Congress-sional District, the personal popularity and marked ability of Judge Blanchard is likely to overcome the same and insure his election.

How is it that our daily papers ignore the fact that Hon. Jos. McKenna was the champion of protection to California wines? While the great Republican party is entitled to credit for hearkening to the arguments and reasons of Joe McKenna in affording protection to our home products, still the true praise should be given to our Congressman. Even Geo. Hearst is posing for this credit, when he, under the party doctrine, votes against the measure. California people know to whom the credit is due. There are some chronic croakers who are eternally finding fault, and who ask with an air of knowledge—"What has Joe McKenna done?" We answer. He has been a broad-minded statesman. He has secured the recognition of the men of our Nation. He has obtained valued appropriations for our district, when handicapped by designing members for other districts. He has attained a distinction accorded only to broad gauge men, that in being foremost in the fiscal affairs of our country. His position as a member of the Ways and Means Committee discloses the favor with which he is considered by the leading lights of the Nation. He is one of the right bowers of Blaine, being in full accord with that great statesman's views. He is above the littleness of using his position as a member of Congress to secure patronage—office for his friends at the sacrifice of honor or principle. While he is pleased to assist his friends in matters of public patronage, he will not barter his honor nor become a nuisance to the several departments of State in the interest of place hunters. Joe McKenna is a thoughtful man, one who does not place himself in the front, but awaits legitimate and merited recognition. When we are asked, "What has McKenna done?" we can refer to the work of the Ways and Means Committee in giving us a protective tariff, and in which he was a valued factor. His reciprocity views took shape in Blaine's able arguments and became a part of the policy of the Nation. The wine and grape interests of this State owe a debt of eternal gratitude to Joe McKenna. The people of Sacramento must thank him for the untiring efforts in securing appropriations for a government building. The residents of our valleys owe him much for his endeavors in protecting their lands from the results of hydraulic mining. While demagogues were claiming the credit of river protection, McKenna was the moving and acting spirit—the alleged claimants for favor being absent from the House when McKenna received the recognition. Only ignorant and small minds—men who are enemies of the policy of the party, can find fault with Joe McKenna. The same class of men can and do make this interrogation—"What has Blaine ever done?" With the same propriety and same reason they might ask, "What did Clay, or Webster, or Douglass ever do?" Their works are part of the policy of the Nation. So it is with McKenna, he has been a factor in shaping the policy of the Nation, by his identity with the tariff and reciprocity action of Congress. Only the little narrow-minded place hunters can find fault with the Congressional career of Hon. Jos. McKenna. He has represented his district and the Nation, as a member of Congress, and not the instrument of individuals.

Dumas perpetrated a little joke on theatrical managers in Paris. He wrote a new play and sent it for review to the several managers of theaters in Paris, omitting to give his name as the author. By each of these profound critics the play was returned without recommendation. This is not a new trick by any means. But it illustrates how little the ordinary manager or critic relies on genuine merit for his review. With such, in these times—and indeed in all times—the purest trash, if only appended with the name of some noted writer, is sufficient to warrant the loudest praise. It is not merit that tells, but the reputation of the author that secures recognition in most instances. Now, if Dumas had signed his name to the play, the managers would have grabbed it with avidity and heralded to the world a new and startling drama, by the famous author. But unthinking and unreasoning, these fellows did not read the play, or if they did read it, did not comprehend its scope or meaning, thus showing what their criticism amounts to. Boucicault gained the favor of the greatest comedian—Matthews—through a mistake. Matthews had secured the services of a distinguished writer to furnish him with a new farce, and when young Boucicault came to see the famous actor, he was mistaken for the agent of the artist employed, and on reading the little sketch prepared by Boucicault, approved it under a misapprehension, yet when the genuine comedy was furnished, he had the brains to understand and commend it. If the mass of the productions of the so-called eminent writers were given to the world, minus the name of the author, there would be very much that would never see the light of day. The fame of the author covers a large amount of unmeritorious reading matter that appears in print. Able review articles are often consigned to the waste basket, to give place to the poor vaporings of some distinguished writer who is written out. Goldsmith could not pledge his brilliant productions for a week's rent. Milton's Paradise Lost was condemned by the publishers as unworthy of publication. Longfellow could not induce a country editor to give place to his earlier effusions. The bubble reputation is the open sesame, merit or no merit.

There has been more wind and ventilation of outraged, spasmodic virtue on the subject of the Addie Ballou's "Morning" and the reading of that Russian Tolstoi's "Kreutzer Sonata" than would supply a country pulpit for the coming decade. And what is it all worth? We are not prepared to give an opinion on either, nor would we if we were asked, simply because we do not regard it as anybody's business what we think when we see a naked woman, or what thoughts are struggling for supremacy when we read of matters and things that should only be whispered between a married couple when all the town is asleep, and the curtains tightly drawn; but we do essay to advance as an undeniable fact that there is source for more sins of thought and impurity to be viewed in the nearly naked forms of the modern ballet dancer; the coy, agile coryphee as she halts at the footlight and counts the bald-heads in the audience, with her well-arched foot for a pointer as it stretched well over the orchestra; or in the lebidinous prints that illustrate the weekly sporting papers, and whose purchase is not confined to the opium fiend and Barbary coaster, but are liberally patronized by the elite of the female persuasion. For it cannot be denied that our young girls have often been known to clandestinely send for and purchase the sheets, and with their friends seek a trysting spot where they could satisfy their carnal appetites by the study of the nude therein found, and smack their lips over the appetizing, harrassing stories of cruel murders, infanticides, malpractice among quack doctors, rapes, kidnapping, wine suppers resulting in lost virtue, naughty doings at sea-shore resorts, and all the other vulgarity so temptingly set before the public. Nor is that all; that same class of high-toned readers easily find a way to foster themselves of the raciest works of those obscene French writers, so many of whom are flooding the world with matter that would cause an Apache to grunt in shame could he read in his own language some of their smut. And is there a young lady, who pretends to be a reader, who has never read Byron's "Don Juan," Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis" or his "Passionate Pilgrim," Tom Moore's "Love of the Angels," Pope's "January and May," Tom Moore's "Anacreon," "Laus Veneris" and a hundred of other effusions by the most celebrated literati of the English speaking and writing world. Scarcely one of our fascinating belles would care to admit such dark ignorance could be but to acknowledge her familiarity with those writings without being "found out" by the other side of the human family.

Truth to tell, these very same writings are always in the author's best style of composition, for pathos, description, sentiment of all kinds, and for the most perfect rhythm, no other writings of those authors glow more fervently than what are called their "bad pieces." Yes, the "ladies" like them, and among themselves slyly talk of the keen pleasure they felt when reading all this filth that but deals with the animal passions of the sexes. It will be urged that the world grows bad—immoral—apace as to both the male and female branches of society. A pert, active, coquetish young lady, who is the toast of her circle, was heard to say the other day: "I like to be bad sometimes when I know I can't be found out. It is so stupid to be always good. Besides, one never learns anything of the world by being too good." And it is just this kind of a girl that enjoys that kind of independence so distinguishing the American miss from her sister anywhere else in the world. If she is known to read nasty literature, look with cautious squint at the naked in art, and talk learnedly of both with some adorning ex-barber, passing for a count, she is deemed a thoroughbred. But does it make the picture or the book any the less objectionable because a semi-fast girl preaches the ancient homily of "Evil to him who evil thinks" (honi soit qui mal y pense)? Scarcely. Because that infernal bank account of her father's enables the daughter to do a lot of questionable things in this day of money worshiping, that would at once put the honest washer-woman's daughter down on the list as belonging to the outcasts.

Supposing those naked pictures, all but perfect in all things that are perfect in the human form, were placed on exhibition in the city's shop windows, how many self respecting, modest girls would care to be found looking at them? Suppose there stood a group of evil-minded boys commenting on that "shape," how many girls who care for their good names would care to listen to the vile talk such pictures would suggest? Suppose those books should be read aloud at evening gatherings in a mixed circle of friends, how many would care to be auditors of the occasion? Then suppose some of our society belles were invited to appear in some public hall, dressed just like "Morning," and give readings from Tolstoi's late creation for charity sake; how many would care to assume the role, although the coffers would overflow with many a twenty? Then what is the great difference in the thoughts suggested or the feelings engendered, save one is inanimate and one the living, breathing being itself? The mothers and fathers of to-day would seem to think little of the virtue of their tender daughters if they hold that there can be no harm in looking at a painted picture. Some people cry out against the nimble ballet dancer but gloat over the picture of an entirely naked woman, and then excuse themselves on the score that it is the perfection of art. Indeed it is a source of consideration what kind of a woman could permit herself to paint such a picture, and who could have been her model—for she must have had one—when her talent might have been better employed.

Take time. It is no use to fume or fret, as the angry housekeeper, who has got hold of the wrong key, and pushes, and shakes, and rattles it about the lock until both are broken and the door is still unopened.

The chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in cultivating our undergrowth of small pleasures.

Try to regard present vexations as you will regard them a month hence.

Since we cannot get what we like, let us like what we can get.

It is not riches, it is not poverty—it is human nature that is the trouble.

The world is like a looking-glass—laugh at it and it laughs back; frown at it and it frowns back.

Angry thoughts canker the mind and dispose it to the worst temper in the world—that of fixed malice and revenge. It is while in this temper that most men become criminals.

A New English Game.

A new out-of-door game, called "The Colors," has been invented by Mrs. A. Hartshorne, of Bradbourne Hall, near Derby, England. It may be played by four or eight players. For the four players the materials for the game are four sets of five posts, painted red, white, blue and green. Each player has a little rack, on which he or she carries eight rings, two each of the same colors and two small flags bearing the letters "R" and "L," signifying right and left. There are also flags, painted black, to indicate a miss or "fault."

The court should be 60 feet long by 36 feet wide. To arrange the ground the posts are planted in sets of five, each post two feet six inches apart from its neighbor, in a figure which would form a cross, the first or starting set being at one end of the ground, the end or finishing set at the extreme end of the court, exactly opposite the start, and the side sets in the middle of each side of the court.

Each player being furnished with his complement of eight rings, which have previously been shaken up in a bag, two partners stand on each side of the starting set of posts facing each other. The whole object of the game is to get rid of the rings in such a manner that they retain their proper sequence on the posts. There is no throwing or running. The players walk leisurely from set to set, deposit their rings if they can and then walk on to the next set of posts. One player may get rid of a ring by placing it on his partner's ring and any player may play two rings following, if possible.

There is no hurry or scurry, but there is a certain amount of science in the game and, of course, it may be varied in many ways. It may be called the quadrille of garden games. It will never in any way interfere with tennis, because it appeals to totally different people from tennis players, but there is plenty of room for it and it is certainly prettier and more interesting than croquet, though it seems so simple.

The new game was played the other afternoon in the garden of the inner temple by a number of trained players before a party of specially invited guests.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The New York World learns that persons who have seen Sara Bernhardt in her rehearsals as Cleopatra are somewhat undecided as to which is Sara and which is the asp.

Henry Arthur Jones' first play was rejected by a dozen managers before it was finally accepted by Wilson Barrett. It made a success, and to-day the dozen managers crook the pregnant hinges of the knee when Mr. Jones calls around with a MS.

Miss Jennie Williams, a young actress, who played recently in Minnie Maddern's company and starred in Aimee's play Mam'zelle, has married Lawrence J. Petre, a wealthy English gentleman. He first saw the lady on the stage of the London Alhambra.

Minnie Hank's pet is a parrot that says, "Bravo, Minnie Hank," when she sings the Habanero. Ella Russell loves a black and tan collie named Othello; Patti, a parrot; Scalchi, a parrot; Elena Sanz, also a parrot; Marie Decca, a cat named Rubenstein; Emma Eames once loved a Havana dog, and Mme. Stolz used to cherish a tame snake.

The "standing-room-only" sign was recently exhibited at the New York Standard Theater. It had been noised forth to the uttermost parts of the town that Miss Sibyl Johnstone, in her characterization of Iza, in the Clemenceau Case, had, during the studio scene in the third act, posed in a costume of transcendent brevity. Miss Pearl Eytings, who was the original Iza, decided that she was not equal to the physical requirements of the part, and resigned in favor of Miss Johnstone, who, after one rehearsal, made her debut in the role. The slight drapery lacked in point of proper concealment, and was unpleasantly suggestive. When Miss Johnstone's form dawned upon the audience its lines were clothed in two solitary garments—a knit jersey and fleshings. The conventional trunks were missing and not a thread of drapery broke the curves of the actress' symmetrical figure. The acting Captain of the Tenderloin Precinct, in which the theater is located, was among the audience. He said the law was not violated, but told Manager Hill he would receive a complaint from him if he cared to make it.

It was probably determined that the world must be amused about the time that it was determined that the people in it must work. It was discovered, no doubt, as early as that time, that all work and no play made folk dull, and hence, it may be inferred, the play was invented and the theater arose, unquestionably long before Thespis "starred" it through the streets of Athens on his cart. The love for the stage, which had so early an origin, is as well shown by the play-goers of the minor theaters as by those of greater pretensions, and the former have their place in the amusement world by as fair a warrant as the latter have theirs. Indeed, it is the lesser theaters nowadays which prepare audiences for the greater ones; they are educators for the drama in their way.

Fred Stinson, Julia Marlowe's manager, tells rather an amusing story about Herbert Kelcey—"handsome Bertie," of "The Charity Ball" organization. Stinson came from London to America in company with Kelcey on the latter's first trip to this country, some years ago. Fred was waiting for the train when the magnificent Herbert appeared, followed by a man carrying an enormous box. "Hello," said the manager, "what have you got in that box?" "Me bawth tub," was the unconcerned reply. "What are you going to do with it?" pursued Stinson. "Use it in America," returned Kelcey. "Oh," said Fred, good-humoredly; "I wouldn't cart it across the sea if I were you. America is developing, you know. If I remember rightly there were six or seven bath-tubs there when I left, and I think the number has swelled considerably since. You will probably find a tub all right." "Are you quite sure?" asked Kelcey, in amazement. "It's safe to take the chances," was the reply. So Kelcey left the "bawth-tub" behind with many misgivings. "You see," said Stinson, concluding the story, "there are lots of Englishmen even to this day who fancy that we hunt buffaloes on Broadway and kill bears in Wall street. Kelcey, I need hardly say, has changed his views. Now, when he makes his periodical visits to the old country, he always carries with him a lot of things which he finds absolutely essential to his comfort and which can be obtained only in America."

During an engagement, at Liverpool, Charles Kean acted in the Lady of Lyons three or four times. For the first three representations, the prompter was at his post regularly, and all went smoothly; on the last night, however, he was unfortunately called away. Claude commenced his description as usual, with the words:

Nay, dearest, nay.

If thou wouldst have me paint thee—

At this moment he fixed his eyes on the spot where the prompter should have been, but found him not. The Prince of Como paused and cried back, saying:

If thou wouldst have me paint—

I say—if thou wouldst have me paint thee—

Then he collapsed utterly, exclaiming audibly to Mrs. Kean, who had in vain attempted to prompt him: "It's no use, Ellen; I'm flummoxed!" His most ludicrous mishap, however, occurred in Belfast, when he was acting Othello. He had just heard a bogus report of the alleged death of his intimate friend Murray, the Edinburgh manager, which somewhat unhinged him. He got through his first scene without difficulty, but when he came to the apology, he had barely uttered the first line: "Most potent, grave and revered signors," when his memory left him altogether. He inquired anxiously of me (I was the Cassio): "What is it?" In the innocence of my heart I responded: "What is what?" "The word! the word!" he replied. "Which word?" I ingenuously asked. "Why, the word I want!" "But," said I, "I don't know which word you do want!" Mrs. Kean and the prompter both saw something was wrong and they each tried to prompt him from the wings, but in vain. At last a luminous idea occurred to me. I whispered him the last line of the apology; he accepted the suggestion, and boldly cutting out a hundred lines or more "in one fell swoop," he exclaimed:

Here comes the lady—let her witness it!

Whereupon the entrance of the gentle Desdemona got us out of our difficulty. Years afterward when he played Wolsey in his magnificent revival of Henry VIII at the Princess', he suffered more from nervousness than he had ever done, and it was alleged (though I cannot vouch for it from my own personal knowledge) that two young girls that followed as pages in his train were carefully taught the words of Wolsey, so that in the event of his breaking down they might prompt him.—Temple Bar.

What excuse have you for going on the stage? Vanity. To elevate it, or be elevated by it? How absurd! To elevate it of course. What led you to this step? Amateur theatricals, society papers, and the adulation of discriminating friends, who say I can bring the Prince of Wales to my feet. That is the ambition of all women in American Society. What was your previous condition of servitude? A wife and mother. Husband alive or dead? Alive, unfortunately. Doesn't he support you? Of course he does; but I want the earth, and, as his income is limited to one continent only, we are not affinities. How many children? Two. What sex? Both. What ages? Four and six. What will you do with them? Leave them with their father and grandmother. Genius must be unfettered. Is not duty—? Don't talk to me about duty. Duty is intended for those who can do nothing else. Genius knows no duty. It is a law unto itself. If you should fail? There's no such word in my lexicon. See me in Lady Macbeth, and you will ask no such question. In what role will you make your debut? Juliet. What henceforth will be your object in life? Applause and the centre of the stage.

How, then, do you elevate the profession you adopt? By deigning to be associated with it, though of course I'll not mix with other actresses. They don't belong to my set. Suppose your set cuts you? I'll anticipate such a movement by cutting them. How will you attract the general public? By doing something that will get me talked about in the papers. But this is not elevating the stage! Evidently you were born yesterday, and don't understand your business. My leading man is waiting to take me to rehearsal. Good-morning.—Kate Fields Washington.

Book Chat.

I see thee as thou wast not long ago,
And yet what seems an age of fleeting time;
I love thee as when, in thy queenly prime,
Thou gav'st thy heart to me, and told me so,
Thou art the touchstone of my nature still—
The source from whence my inspirations flow—
The cherished idol of my life—and will
That idol be while years shall come and go.

The years are rapid in their silent flight,
And days are nothing in the estimate—
So short are they. We hasten from the light
Into the darkness, ruled by unseen Fate,
And life is short. Yet thou art dear to me,
And ever more, through endless time, must be.

M. Alphonse Daudet, the famous French novelist, is now quite recovered from his recent illness, and is busily engaged on a new novel as well as a play, the latter being intended for the Gymnase Theatre.

What has become of Mr. Saltus? Has the light gone out? If it does gleam again will it have a sinister or a reassuring lustre? A good many readers who esteem the art of fiction as an art, yet wish always to see it modestly married to honest morality, seem disinclined to admit that they are to have nothing more and nothing different from Edgar Saltus.

The indefatigable Shakespearean scholar and editor, Dr. William J. Rolfe, has prepared a new edition of "Shakespeare's Poems," which will soon be issued. This will be the first thoroughly annotated edition of the poems published in this country. The Notes will embrace the results of the late investigations and discoveries relative to the history of the "Sonnets," together with much bibliographical and other information of great value to the Shakespearean student. The text of all the poems is given without omission or expurgation.

Chas. Lamb's ideas of book marking are to be found in his correspondence with Coleridge, in which he states that a book reads the better when the topography of its plots and notes are thoroughly mastered, and when we "can trace the dirt on it, to having read it at tea with buttered muffins, or over a pipe." Lamb's library consisted for the most part of tattered volumes in a dreadful state of repair. Young, the poet, "dog-eared" his books to such an extent that many of them would hardly close at all; while Voltaire and Montague were never so happy as when scoring over the leaves with pen and ink; and this practice they followed even in the case of borrowed books.

The largest antique bookstore in the world is Quaritch's, in Piccadilly. There one can find missals in the quaint notation of 500 years ago; musical instruction books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and, in short, every rarity that the devout antiquarian could desire. Some of these things cost rather solid prices. One music book that the great collector showed me was marked at $10,000. I cannot afford such luxuries until the price of music lessons goes up. Nevertheless, both here and in some of the old book stalls near St. Paul's, I managed to find some musical rarities. A lot of sheet music of the years 1738 and 1739, with the quaintest of engravings attached, gives me some almost forgotten songs by Handel and Henry Carey; an early edition of "God Save Great George, Our King," shows me some variations of the ending which are not used nowadays; but best of all, I have obtained a copy of the tune of "The Star Spangled Banner," dated some dozen years before our national anthem was written! I suppose that most of your readers know that "The Star Spangled Banner" was originally an English drinking song, entitled "To Anacreon in Heaven." This copy gives the old tune and sets it to Masonic words, "To Old Hiram in Heaven," celebrating the supposed founder of Freemasonry and builder of the Temple at Jerusalem. It proves that the air was popular and well known in England long before America appropriated it.

Professional Chat.

Padre Vines, a Jesuit father in Havana, has been making weather predictions so accurately for twenty-five years, that our Government recently offered him a salary. But as a priest he could not accept such recognition.

Dr. Squills—When I first began to practice I had mighty little to do, but I was patience on a monument. Listener—And I presume you soon built up a practice?

"Yes, it wasn't long till I began to have monuments on my patients."

In Baltimore, where Chief Justice Fuller has been making a visit on business, it is thought that he resembles Henry Ward Beecher in appearance, probably because he wears his hair long. Beecher was much heavier, and wore no mustache.

Doctor—"What, drinking beer again, contrary to my strict orders? Didn't I tell you that every glass was a nail in your coffin?" "I can't give it up, doctor, that's a fact, and so I have been saying to myself: 'What does it matter when you are dead and gone if your coffin does look like a hedgehog?'"

Of the late Bishop Ames the following anecdote is told: While presiding over a certain conference in the west, a member began a tirade against the universities and education, thanking God that he had never been corrupted by contact with a college. After proceeding thus for a few minutes the bishop interrupted with the question: "Do I understand that the brother thanks God for his ignorance?" "Well, yes," was the answer; "you can put it that way if you want." "Well, all I have to say," said the bishop, in his sweetest musical tone, "all I have to say is that the brother has a good deal to thank God for."

In the course of the trial of a lawsuit against a horse-railway in New York, the leading counsel for the losing side, a robust and witty Irishman, endeavored to work on the sympathies of the jury by calling attention to the ease with which corporations obtained franchises from an alleged corrupt Legislature. "Whoy, gintlemin uv th' joory," he said, impressively, "in these days phin fran-chises are given away at Albany, any man can get a fran-chise to run a harse railway ovver pheres. Indade, gintlemin, it would not surprise me to hear at any toime that me learned fri'nd, the coun-sel for the opposition, had got a fran-chise to run a harse railway down me spoine, wid th' privilege uv usin' me ribs for switchus."

Ugliness as a disqualifying cause seems intelligible in a candidate for matrimony, but is certainly less so when the question is one of fitness for military service. This, however, is one on the list of disqualifications laid down by the head of the Medical Department in the manual just issued on "Conscription in France." Latterly the French authorities seem to be much more liberal in admitting the claims of men who do not wish to serve. The rejections are 5 per cent. more numerous than at the previous conscription. The French are looking more to the quality of their army than to the number of recruits. Excessive ugliness, says the military doctors, makes a man ridiculous, prevents him from having authority over his comrades, and leaves him morbid and sensitive. If the ugliness be adequate the claim must be allowed. "Male hysteria" is another valid plea. The army doctors say it exists among French conscripts, and it is the more objectionable as it is contagious.

A tender-hearted North Carolina judge of "ye olden time," seeing that the evidence was going strongly against a young fellow who was being tried before him for his life, and dreading to pronounce the sentence which he felt to be inevitable, left the court-room under some pretext, to which he presently returned fortified with several strong drinks. It chanced that the judge took more than he intended of the intoxicating beverage, and when the jury (greatly to the surprise of everyone) brought in a verdict of "Not guilty!" he was slumbering heavily upon the bench, and had to be aroused in order to hear the decision. With his mind still full of the dread which had overwhelmed him, and utterly unable, in the bewildered state of his brain, to take in the altered condition of affairs, the old fellow slowly erected himself: "Jones," he said, solemnly, speaking in the nasal tone peculiar to him, and brushing an imaginary insect from his nose, as was his custom when under the influence of strong feeling, "it now becomes my painful duty—" "Your Honor—" put in one of the jury. "I beg, Mr. Robinson," replied the judge, "that you will not interrupt me. Mr. Jones," he continued, turning to the prisoner, "I knew your father, sir, an eminently respectable and respected citizen, who little thought that his son would come to the disgraceful end which is to be yours, for you are to be hanged by the neck, sir—" "Your Honor," Robinson said again, almost imploringly, permit me to explain—" "Mr. Robinson," replied the judge, "I must insist that you do not interrupt me again" (striking at the imaginary fly) "while I am performing the most solemn duty, sir, that belongs to my office. Mr. Jones" (turning again to the prisoner), "I know, sir, that this sentence, which I feel constrained to pronounce, is breaking the heart of your poor old mother there" (pointing to the wife of the murdered man, who, sitting somewhat apart, was looking daggers at the jury), "and, sir, bringing her gray hairs in sorrow to the grave. For you are to be hanged, sir—to be—" "S—," broke in Robinson, unable to contain himself any longer, and dropping the judicial title in his desperation; "you are making a — fool of yourself. The jury has brought in a verdict of 'Not guilty!'" — Harper's Magazine.

NOTES.

Many men resemble the moon, not only in being out all night, but likewise in being brightest when they are full.

One beauty about Senator Ingalls' speeches is their rasping effect upon Democratic nerves. He is hated almost as cordially by the Bourbons as Speaker Reed himself, and enjoys it fully as well.

Governor Ferry, of Washington, humorously declares that his army of notaries far outnumber the military, and in case of a public necessity, he would call them out in stead of the militia.

It is said that natural gas has been struck in Sacramento. 'Tis nothing novel. Gas, gas, nothing but gas, both natural and unnatural, has ever been the characterizing feature and resultant of everything Sacramentans have ever undertaken for their own good.

The Democratic charge that the sugar schedule has been fixed to suit the Sugar Trust, is made either in ignorance or willful insincerity. The schedule puts a reduced duty on sugar above No. 16. What the trust wanted was free sugar below No. 13, and higher duties on all above that quality.—Bulletin.

Now the Cuban government is begging Spain the home government to intercede with Uncle Sam in their behalf on the cigar and tobacco trade. Reciprocity has brought them to realize that we can get along without Havana tobacco or cigars. Our olive-colored neighbors cannot get along without our trade and they know it. We can smoke Key West cigars and sell our wheat elsewhere if necessary.

A newly discovered remedy in the domain of medicine, and one that is exciting considerable comment among physicians and pharmacists, is what is known as hypnol. To the French chemists belongs the honor and credit of the discovery, and it will remain for them to prove the excellence of the discovery, also its practical application to the curing of disease as a safe, sure and speedily acting medical agent. Hypnol is as yet comparatively unknown in this country except as treated in medical literature.

An enthusiastic young reporter, Isadore Alexander, has received the Examiner's prize for efficiency in news gathering. The young man is a worker in the true sense of the term, and if he has an idea that any person is possessed of a news item he will never "let go" until he secures it. In all matters of news Alexander never loses an opportunity. In political news, however, he shapes the facts so as to accord with the views of his principal, otherwise he is O. K. We are glad his wealth has been augmented in the sum of $350 for his labor.

The older we get the more are we admonished that the terse autobiography written by George Arnold, the poet, of himself, is suitable for most men:

"I was born some time ago, but I know not why;
I have lived—I hardly know either how or where;
Sometime or another, I suppose I shall die;
But where, how, or when, I neither know nor care."

When we die nobody else cares.

One day last week an up-town saloon was attacked. The Constable selected as keeper an ex-Constable, who was supposed to understand his duties. But the temptation of free drinks was too much for the dry duty of a long, lonely vigil, and soon the law's watchman, snugly tucked in a comfortable arm-chair, was deep in slumber bound. A would-be patron of the place happened in while the place was deserted save the presence of the vigilant keeper. Being of a kitenish turn, the visitor quietly despoiled the sleeping beauty of his watch and hung it on the wall over the bottles, a label under it announcing, "Tick goes here." Then he as deftly detached the watcher's badge of office from his manly bosom and affixed it to a place where it would do as much good as if it remained where the law required it to be, the victim being conveniently seated with his feet elevated high on a card table, so that it was an easy job to pin the official star to the bosom of its astute owner's trousers. Having thus decorated and desecrated the law's majestic representative, the wag departed. It was not till the attaching officer, later on, dropped in, perhaps to take a drop in, that the somnolent deputy was aroused, and for the first time missed his watch and badge. The watch was soon discovered, but search for the badge was abandoned, and the keeper in despair sat suddenly and severely in a chair, when the point of the joke at once penetrated his understanding, and he bled him to bed a little sorer yet owner of the fine pointed evidence of his authority.

From the excavations at Pompeii, instruments have been found which are very similar to our modern surgical and dental instruments. In the works of Hippocrates and in the Susruta of the Hindus full descriptions are given of many surgical instruments of steel. A writer in October Century, gives some interesting details of ancient surgery as well as modern improvements.

The situation of politics in this county is somewhat like the National fight in 1872. Then it was that in opposition to the Republican party there was an immense head and an extremely small tail. It will be recollected that Thomas Nast, in his caricatures, represented Mr. Greeley as the prominent figure and Gratz Brown was represented only by a small tag pinned on to the coat tail of Mr. Greeley. With us we must assume that our local Democratic party has its coat off ready for work, and it is a question where upon the voter's trousers the tag to represent the corporal guard of soreheads will be pinned.

Wonder if Sacramento, city and county, will ever take steps to have themselves and their resources, industries, etc., represented at the Columbian Fair to be held in Chicago in 1892? But probably it will do to postpone action till a week or two before the opening. However, come to think of it, there will be several elections between now and then, and the voters may be induced to acquire sufficient self-respect to select a few men to the local offices who will be able to believe the people should be treated as if they had some rights, and who will be willing to at least attempt to infuse new life and new blood into affairs at home, so that we will cease to be a laughing stock abroad. Let us pray.

The State Library Trustees some time ago made a set of rules for the government of the library, among which is one that no books shall be taken from the law department except on the order of the Superior Judges. Yesterday morning, in the Superior Court, Judge Van Fleet, before calling his law calendar, made the observation, that of late he had been frequently asked by attorneys to sign orders for books from the library. He gave notice that hereafter he would not sign any such orders. That he did not recognize the right of the Trustees of the library to make any such rules, and further he does not propose to make himself responsible for books taken out on such orders. The same courtesy certainly should be extended to attorneys' orders for books as well as to the Court's order.

A couple of weeks ago, we referred to the remarkable case of Shylock vs. Antonio of Shakespeare, in order to illustrate a point of law. From the Albany Law Journal we extract the following as "Shylock in a Modern Court." An extortionate claimant to a valuable property in Rochester, New York, had obtained his alleged title to certain property, through a Sheriff's deed, for a trifling consideration, and brought his action in ejectment against the judgment debtor, who was in possession. The case went through various stages of trials and appeals, and at last was likely to result in favor of defendant. The plaintiff having discovered some technical omissions of his own, at the outset of the litigation, made a motion to discontinue the suit without judgment for defendant's costs. The counsel above referred to, who approved the application, said he had searched all the authorities within his reach for a precedent and had found but one. It was Shylock's reply when the Court directed him to sign the "deed of gift." "I pray the Court give me leave to go from hence. I am not well."

The Southern hatred of the colored race is intense. The Mississippi Constitutional Convention asks Congress to submit to a vote of the people a proposition to repeal the 15th Amendment. It is claimed that the white and negro races in the South will always conflict, and that they are so widely separated by race instincts and prejudices that they can never harmonize. They urge, that no matter how well the negro may be educated, that he cannot become such a factor in governmental affairs as to permit him to rule with the whites. This is the real sentiment of the South, and the arbitrary and high-handed practices to carry all elections is only the result of this race prejudice. This is part of the appeal: Such a condition of insecurity is not only a great political and social evil, but also greatly impedes industrial developments; and, inasmuch, as the white people only are capable of conducting and maintaining the government of such States, the negro race (even if its people were educated) being wholly unequal to such great responsibility, therefore it is the deliberate judgment of the people of Mississippi that the only efficient remedy lies in the repeal of the 15th Amendment, whereby such restrictions may be put upon negro suffrage by the several States as may be necessary and proper for the maintenance of good and staple governments therein. Congress is asked to submit the proposition to the States.

There has been a deal said about the severe shock that sensitive spectators experience when they first look upon the enrapturing "Morning," lately ostracized by the apostolic edict of the State Agricultural parliament. But what must have been the abhorrence and disgust of the public at Woodland last Saturday night, the occasion of a political meeting, when the visiting speakers were received at the depot by the local band, marshalled by a drum major "in a scarlet coat!" Only this and nothing more, for the report of that meeting was minute in detail, and if that "major" of the sheep-skin fiddle had had aught else wherewith to clothe his figure it would have been mentioned. So hereafter, let nothing be said of that naked woman, for of the two evils it is admitted among men that it is infinitely preferable and more gratifying to view a naked woman (some prudes call it nude, but the ancient and correct Anglo-Saxon word in speaking or writing is by odds to be preferred for the sake of the purity of the language) than a man with nothing to hide his frame-work. Some celebrated student of human anatomy has advanced it as his opinion that there is nothing in nature so abhorrent to the refined taste as a naked man. He is angular; he is bony; generally speaking, his shape is bad and requires clothes to prevent it from becoming ridiculous; his limbs are ill-shapen; his toes lap and are twisted, and in brief he is not proportionately built. Not so with the female form divine. When the Creator fashioned her, all that had been and was to be, stood motionless as a model, while the Master hand perfected in her person all that Omnipotence thought would be essential to attract the admiring gaze of all other created being for time and through eternity.

Political Tragedies.

At Little Rock, Arkansas, on Wednesday, Powell Clayton made a speech in which he said that the State of Arkansas would never be cleared from the stain of the murder of John M. Clayton as long as Breckinridge remains in Congress. In conclusion, he said: "Life was once dear to me, but the time has now come when I can take my life in my hands with perfect resignation, and if I can only succeed in defeating Breckinridge, I will willingly die in the cause." This is something of a reminder of old-time politics. The National Capitol has been the scene of very many encounters between distinguished men. Perhaps the most noted was the assault made upon Charles Sumner, the Senator from Massachusetts, by Preston S. Brooks, a Congressman from South Carolina. Sumner had in debate replied to a speech of Senator Butler of South Carolina. Brooks was a relative of Butler, and took offense at Sumner's remarks. During a recess of the Senate, while Sumner was sitting at his desk writing, Brooks approached him and without a word of warning, knocked him senseless with a heavy cane, and doubtless would have killed him had he not been restrained. The act was denounced by both Houses, and Brooks defiantly resigned, but was immediately reelected by his people. The matter grew out of the old slavery question and from a discussion upon the admission of Kansas. From remarks uttered in a debate, a duel resulted between Henry Clay, the Secretary of State, and John Randolph, and had it not been for the friendly intercession of Thomas H. Benton, Mr. Clay would have been killed. Randolph had it in his power to fire with deadly effect, but, after having received Clay's fire, discharged his weapon into the air. At another time Col. Benton and Senator Henry S. Foote had words in the Senate, and Foote drew a pistol, when Benton threw back the lappel of his coat, denounced Foote as a coward and invited his fire. In our own State there have been several instances where fatal results have been the outgrowth of political quarrels—notably the killing of Senator Broderick by Judge Terry. Charles W. Piercy was killed in a duel by D. Showalter. Both were members of the Assembly, and the affair grew out of remarks made in debate. When the legislative sessions were held in the Court-house in this city, John C. Bell, an Assemblyman from El Dorado, was fatally shot and stabbed by Doctor Stone. It is gratifying that of late years there have been no recurrences of these political encounters. It is however apparent, that in the South it is likely there will be repetition. The murder of Clayton was extremely aggravating, and there can be little to condemn of the declaration of his relative.

A Reminiscence of Edgerton.

The campaign orations of Henry Edgerton abound in beautiful sentiments expressed with that eloquence and rounded periods peculiar to that accomplished man. Edgerton was selected to open the second Grant campaign at Platt's Hall, in San Francisco, and those who on that occasion saw that magnificent audience and witnessed their keen delight as the sentences fell from the lips of the orator, recall with pleasure the great triumph of the handsome, gifted man who for nearly two hours held that crowded hall spell-bound with the charm of his speech. Edgerton was then one of the handsomest men living, and in all the land there was no one who could justly claim to be his equal upon the rostrum. His splendid exordium, containing as it does, the celebrated brief eulogies upon Broderick, Baker, Tracy and Starr King, are given below, and we commend it to the perusal of all as one of the best examples of the kind in political literature. The speech was delivered on the evening of October 8, 1872, and was a fitting commencement of a memorable national campaign.

"It was a beautiful conception of a pagan poet that the life of the dead is in the memory of the living. I cannot commence my address this evening without consecrating a few words to the martyrs and orators whose magnetic influence still lingers around this tribune, whose names and examples ought ever to be kept fresh and green in every Republican heart and household.

"Here the lion-hearted Broderick made that career which would form an epoch in the life of any people, which marked the commencement and progress of a fierce conflict between freedom and slavery for the possession of the Pacific domain, and stamped him one of the heroic characters of his time, with a clear, far-reaching vision which traced the formation and development of the plot against free institutions in these then fresh, virgin territories, he at once flung the gauge of battle to their adversaries, challenging them upon every arena, in the caucus, in the convention, upon the hustings, in the legislative halls of the State, in the Senate of the nation, upon the field of honor, with a constancy no reverse could shake, a courage no danger could daunt, and an integrity no bribe could bend or taint, he struggled upwards and onwards, against a host of obstacles and enemies, along a path that led through conflict, peril and ceaseless labors to no repose but the grave. Having won a civic crown, and a reputation that made him a source of hope and solace to millions of his countrymen, he was suddenly stricken down, typifying in the stormy warfare of his life, and in the mournful tragedy of his death, the greater struggle and vaster sacrifice, he clearly foresaw, distinctly foretold and which came so soon.

"Here his friend and co-laborer, Tracy, won undying fame by his great services in the cause of progress and reform. Endowed with profound political talents and marvelous gifts of speech, which made him, as Barnave said of Mirabeau, 'The Shakespeare of Eloquence,' by the intense energy of his convictions and the sustained splendors of his imperishable orations, he contributed more than any one of his contemporaries to that revolution which wrested California from the power of chivalry and made it a permanent Republican State.

"Here Baker, the glory of the American rostrum, uplifted upon wings of justice and truth, pronounced those wonderful apostrophes to liberty which electrified the nation. Uniting the spirit of a warrior with the soul of an orator, he defended his country with unsurpassed eloquence and valor in the field and forum, until he at the same moment tasted death and wedded immortality.

"And later and last came one whose lyric voice has hardly yet died away within these walls. I seem to see him as he stood upon this tribune, slender in form, but with capacious head and full orbed, glorified eyes, glowing with the fire of the prophets, the enthusiasm of a martyr and the inspiration of a poet, now denouncing slavery and secession with a tone like the thunder of Heaven over the feast of Belshazzar, now making those memorable appeals, warm with faith and brilliant with poetry, which spread like a diffusive touch through every fiber of the great heart of California, until the loyalty of the masses became so sensitive and fixed that in all the land from the Sierras to the sea, no rebel dared lift his arm against it. In the tempest which turned so many States from their base, it was his glory to be chief among those who saved California from the fury of the shock, and placed it upon foundations broad and deep as the ocean that laves its shores, an everlasting pillar in the structure of American empire. As sweet as the flowers that blossom upon his grave, as perpetual as the sea winds that chant his requiem through the galleries and hills of your city, be the memory of Thomas Starr King."

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Dixey's Adonis will be here on the 13th.

Carlton's English Opera Company is booked for a brief season at the Metropolitan within the coming month.

Arizona Joe's Wild West Combination will appear at the Clunie on Monday and Tuesday nights. The boys will have a chance to witness some of the border scenes depicted on the mimic stage.

Last night the first presentation in this city of Hoyt's Midnight Bell was given to a large and delighted audience. This is a departure from Hoyt's usual farce comedies, and has the genuine sparkle of something real. To-night the same comedy will be given at the Clunie Opera House.

Among the Whistling Marmots.

After lunch we passed through a beautiful piece of bottom land, teeming with flowers, red and yellow monthly musk, fringing the banks of the stream where it spread out over the meadow in a dozen different channels. Charlie wanted to stop and take up 160 acres, but Campbell told him "Too much plenty snow in winter," and after vainly trying to drink the creek dry we passed on. Another turn brought us to the base of a steep, bare, stony mountain. Skirting this and climbing over some big rocks, we suddenly came into a lovely grass country. Like the prairie in summer, every conceivable flower seemed to bloom and blossom in the grass; the place was ablaze with red, blue, yellow and white. We must have passed through 500 or 600 acres of it, and every here and there a rippling stream ran wildly through it. The place was a perfect paradise, and thank goodness we had got out of the dark valley and stood in the warm, bright sunshine. We were now close to the head of the Quileene, and we eagerly pressed on. Presently we met a dog and close after him his master, who turned out to be Mr. Ransom, going from the head of the Dungeness to Port Townsend. He gave us cheerful accounts of the elk, and also kindly took a letter into town for us. At 5:30 we camped under Sentinel rock, about a mile from the divide. This rock stands boldly out alone, like a massive fortress guarding the entrance to the valley of the Dungeness.

Suddenly the mountain sides seemed to be alive with men whistling to one another, when—and one would turn sharp round only to hear another and a shriller whew—on the other side; and soon we saw lots of animals, about the size of a fox, with long bushy tails, running about from rock to rock, sometimes lying down, but more often sitting bolt up, erect, like a ferret does. We shot a couple of small ones that night and afterwards shot several more, larger ones. Campbell called them whistling dogs and declared they were good to eat; but the smell was enough for us. Their odor is peculiar, but not fragrant. They have two long teeth in front like a beaver, and feet almost shaped like squirrel's feet. I believe their right name is mountain beaver. Wherever we went afterwards in the mountains, as long as there was grass, we saw these whistling dogs as we got to call them. I liked to see them; they seemed to make the place cheerful and lively, and were very amusing to watch. In winter they have long burrows under the snow, and their coats get a dark gray; in summer they are yellow. Their skins should make good fur, and I think would pay for being trapped in the winter months. Our altitude this night was 5,450 feet, and we christened the place "Stony Camp," from the terribly stony ground we had to sleep on. The night was warm until about 4 P. M., when it got fearfully cold, and we were almost frozen.—Whitcom Revelle.

Doctors at Berlin.

The army of doctors has apparently enjoyed itself amazingly at Berlin, where science and surgery have been judiciously tempered with amusements of the most varied description. In the history of the world no such array of medicine men has ever been seen as that which met in the gorgeous Kunst Anstellung to listen to the welcoming words of Virchow, the pathologist; Von Gossler, the minister of medicine and religion (an excellent combination of functions), and Von Palckenbeck, the chief burgomaster. Sir James Paget secured the warmest reception of the foreign delegates; Dr. Baccelli, the Italian, "for the convenience of his cari collegli," insisted on using Latin as a common language, and Dr. Von Bergmann's normal appearance has been vastly improved by his brand new uniform, although the passing interest he once excited was wholly eclipsed by Grand Duke Theodore, of Bavaria, the eminent oculist, who brought the grand duchess to look down on her husband's 5,000 fellow practitioners from a box. The heat was more than tropical, but the doctors submitted to be closely packed with the best possible grace, and the one royalty of the whole European faculty was indefatigable in pointing out to his wife such celebrities as the veteran Von Bardeleben, whose breast glittered with orders; Sir William McCormack and fifty others.—London World.

A Faithful Servant.

Oakland is sure of an appropriation for a postoffice before the present Congress closes its short session of the coming winter. Congressman McKenna has worked hard for the bill, and, day before yesterday, during the last busy moments of the session, he secured a favorable report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It was too late to take up the bill and pass it, but it is in a position to pass just as soon as Congress gets down to business after the recess. The amount appropriated is $250,000. This is $50,000 less than the sum appropriated in the Senate bill, but the Senate will undoubtedly agree to the amendment; and $250,000 will purchase a very desirable site and pay for a building of imposing design.

In casting their votes on November 4th, the citizens of Oakland should remember that they owe this appropriation to Congressman McKenna. There is also a little matter of $175,000, which Mr. McKenna has secured for the Oakland harbor improvement, which should not be forgotten. He has pushed himself into a position in Congress in which he can secure these desirable appropriations for his district. A new man would be lost in Washington, and Oakland would get little or nothing. A good Congressman is a good thing to keep at his post. Joseph McKenna is just that kind of a man.—Oakland Tribune.

Why it is Foolscap.

It is often asked why a certain kind of paper is known by the name of "foolscap." When Oliver Cromwell became Protector, after the execution of Charles I, he caused a stamp representing the cap of liberty to be placed upon the paper used by the government. Soon after the restoration of Charles II, he had occasion to use some paper for dispatches, when some of this paper was brought to him. On observing the stamp he asked its meaning, and on being informed he said: "Take it away; I will have nothing to do with a fool's cap!"

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of R. S. McClure, an insolvent debtor.

R. S. McCLURE having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said R. S. McClure is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said R. S. McClure, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent, to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use. And the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. John W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 31st day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated Sept. 25, 1890.

JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.

The Freckled Girl.

At last the world begins to appreciate the merits of the freckled girl. For two or three seasons she has been slowly advancing, until now she stands in the very front row. The poets and artists have taken her up, and the glory of her red brown hair, the cream of her ivory skin, with its artistic flecks of burn number, and her big, long-lashed hazel eyes, with no bottom to them, somebody says—are fruitful themes for pictures from pen and brush. She wears gowns of old blue, with trimmings of dull red; wide hats with drooping plumes, and long, classic draperies; for the freckled girl's form has—as the poet says—a lissome grace. Sing, hey for the freckled girl.

A Noble Ambition Realized.

Fame is a vapor; popularity an accident; riches take wings; the only earthly certainty is oblivion; no man can see what a day will bring forth; while those who cheer to-day will often curse to-morrow; and yet I cherish the hope that the journal I projected and established will live and flourish long after I have moldered into forgotten dust, being guided by a larger wisdom, a more merriment sagacity to discern the right, though not by a more unflinching readiness to embrace and defend it at whatever cost; and that the stone which covers my ashes may bear to future eyes the still intelligible inscription, "Founder of the New York Tribune."—Hon. Greeley.

What should be thought in America of a city that pays for its schools and streets with the profits of an aristocratic rum shop? Yet this is what the "free" city of Bremen has done for a cycle of some generations. In the cellar of the old city building are stored hundreds of thousands of gallons of wine of all ages in ancient tuns. In the same floor are elegantly furnished wine rooms, where every evening in the year the forehanded burghers gather and tap wine of rare vintage. The oldest wine "worth" $20 a bottle, is reserved for the King and Princess. None of less rank may drink it, and the visitor is shown a silver tankard out of which Kaiser William drank on his recent visit. The city of Bremen makes $20,000 a year, clear profit, out of these wine-rooms. There is an elegant little salon where the Emperor is fêted. This metropolitan wine shop has been running the City Council of Bremen for 400 years. The visitor is shown one cellar in which there are 12 casks, each labelled with the name of one of the Twelve Apostles. It is called the Twelve Apostles' Cellar, and the cask labelled "Judas" contains the oldest and best wine in the place.

The very newest thing about town is the "Bombay oyster."

The "Bombay oyster" isn't an oyster at all, of course, but this is the name that has been bestowed upon it.

It is a composition sufficiently simple and common to please the lean and larded purse alike. It is nothing more than an egg dropped unbroken into a tumbler and deluged with vinegar, and sprinkled with pepper and salt.

It is consumed always before breakfast and by a great many sporting men in the city.

One of its effects is to counteract the evil tendencies of overdrinking and overeating. Some stout men like a "Bombay oyster" in the morning, and eat nothing again until noon. For a bilious stomach it is the finest kind of a remedy.

A Lancashire newspaper tells the following good story: An old country gentleman, returning home rather late, discovered a yokel with a lantern under his kitchen window, who, when asked his business there, stated that he had come a-courting. "Come a-what?" asked the irate gentleman. "A-courting, sir. I've courting Mary." "It's a lie!" exclaimed the old gentleman. "What do you want a lantern for? I never used one when I was a young man." "No, sir," was the yokel's reply; "I don't think yer did, judging by the missis!"

A fashion writer says that a person who is well shod, well gloved, and whose headgear is what it should be is always certain of consideration. It may be remarked with still greater truth that the person who is "well heeled" has a mortgage on the entire visible supply of that article.

Notice to Voters.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN TO ALL PARTIES interested, that at a regular meeting of the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento county, California, held on the 16th day of July, 1890, an order was duly made and entered, cancelling the Great Register of said county, and ordering a re-registration of the voters thereof. Said order was made pursuant to Sec. 1091 of the Political Code, and all persons desiring to vote at the next ensuing general election are notified that they will have to be re-registered, as provided in said section and in conformity with this order.

Attest: W. B. HAMILTON,
(Seal) Clerk of Board of Supervisors, Sacramento County, California. aug2

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting.

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 14th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere, and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 15th day of July, A. D. 1890.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California, to J. H. Coghill and A. J. Coghill, greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the clerk's office of said Court, on the second day of August, 1890, in which action John Ruedy is plaintiff and you are defendants. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, quieting title of plaintiff to the south 110 feet of Lot No. 5, and the south 110 feet of the east quarter of Lot 6, block bounded by D and E, and 6th and 7th Streets, in the City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, State of California, and directing defendants to appear and set forth their title, if any they have to said premises, and that defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim thereto, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of August, A. D., 1890.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. D. Bennett, an Insolvent Debtor.

J. D. Bennett having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. D. Bennett is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal of the said J. D. Bennett, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 17th day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated, Sept. 13th, 1890.

Scraps from Harper's Magazine.

A somewhat adventurous spirit arisen in the British army from the rank of the post of major was asked on his return from the Asiatic climes if he had ever been bastinadoed.

"I have, indeed," was the reply—just as it was expected to be.

"And was it really very painful, major?" was asked.

"It was, madame. Upon my sole it was."

The wit of our grandmothers is not all of it old. Many of our grandmothers are alive to-day, and witty as of yore. One of this cherished race of women is responsible for a retort which should be handed down to posterity as a bit of indulgent humor.

Her grandson, an unfortunate ne'er-do-well, was under discussion.

"He will never amount to anything," said a severe uncle. "His head is always up in the clouds."

"Perhaps the boy is looking for the silver lining," replied the kindly old lady.

"That is intelligence, Patrick darlint?" was a question put to a Celtic brother recently by his devoted wife.

"O' dun'no', Nora," he replied. "O' never had wan."

The particular Pat of this story had in some manner engaged himself to an American as a butler. One hot summer night his employer, oppressed by the temperature of the dining-room, turned to Pat and asked:

"Is the window up, Pat?"

"Tis, soor."

"What makes it so awfully close in here, then?"

"O' think it must be th' windy's bein' up, soor. It's shut up."

A wayfarer in New York having occasion to use a cab one morning, requested the driver to take him to the Twenty-third street station of the Third avenue elevated railway.

"Th' Twenty-third Stirate station av the Thurd avynoo is ut?"

"Yes."

"Just phere is tho?"

"At the corner of Twenty-third Street and Third Avenue."

"Ah yis! O' remember now; oi was thayre wance befoore."

"Won't you please play us something, Miss Hammerandbang?" asked McBrick. "I should like to ever so much," she said, looking at her watch; "but, really, I have no time." So I have heard," replied McBrick; "but we will overlook that, you know."

JENKS' DREAM.

Jenks had a queer dream the other night. He thought he saw a prize-fighters' ring, and in the middle of it stood a doughty little champion who met and deliberately knocked over, one by one, a score or more of big, burly-looking fellows, as they advanced to the attack. Giants as they were in size, the valiant pigmy proved more than a match for them. It was all so funny that Jenks woke up laughing. He accounts for the dream by the fact that he had just come to the conclusion, after trying nearly every big, drastic pill on the market, that Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, or tiny Sugar-coated Granules, easily "knock out" and beat all the big pills hollow! They are the original and only genuine Little Liver Pills.

Beware of Imitations, which contain Poisonous Minerals. Always ask for Dr. Pierce's Pellets, which are Little Sugar-coated Pills, or Anti-bilious Granules. One a Dose.

SICK HEADACHE,

Bilious Headache, Dizziness, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the stomach and bowels, are promptly relieved and permanently cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. They are gently laxative, or strongly cathartic, according to size of dose. Smallest, Cheapest, Easiest to take. 25 cents a vial, by druggists.

After-Dinner Oratory.

Is it really true that the English are a more "practical" nation than the French? We have long been accustomed to say so, and it is an observed fact that what people say a sufficient number of times they end by believing. Still, it is very hard to reconcile our preconceived notions of our own superiority in this respect with the many instances which meet us of the simple and straightforward fashion in which our neighbors across the channel are accustomed to deal with situations which we have for generations past been helplessly contemplating. A fresh illustration of this faculty has been just supplied by our Paris correspondent, who, however, may, perhaps, be thought to have patriotically saved our reputation as a practical people by underrating the demand made upon us in this particular case for the display of what is supposed to be our national gift. "After-dinner oratory," he remarks, "can hardly be said to be so flourishing an institution in France as it is in England;" and he adds that "Frenchmen, as a rule, are bad post-prandial speakers," and that, "even at official banquets, the effusions heard seldom attain the heights of eloquence." At "official banquets," perhaps there is not much fault to be found with English oratory; but that is because English official orators have long been taught to regard their chair at the dinner table on certain stated occasions as merely another variety of the political "stump," and are therefore prepared, sometimes by their private secretaries, to deliver precisely the same sort of oration as they would pronounce in the town halls of their justly respected constituencies. We should hesitate to say, however, that after-dinner oratory "flourishes" among us in any other sense than this; and we incline very strongly to the belief that, if the two countries were to make an inquisition of "bad post-prandial speakers"—excluding those whose profession it is to be able to speak anywhere on a certain limited and dreary class of subjects—we could not reckon with any sort of confidence on emerging victorious from the ordeal. Here one would think was a situation eminently calculated to appeal to the genius of a "practical" people. Yet it is the French, it seems, and not ourselves, who have been the first to grapple with it. It is upon them that the idea of the "professional after-dinner orator" has first dawned, and it is they who have taken the lead in the attempt to provide the wretched guest whose name is "down for a toast" with an heroic substitute, who will undergo the torture in his stead. We should scarcely have thought that out of China—where even the inconveniences of capital punishment are sometimes vicariously provided for in this way—it would be possible for such an industry to establish itself.—London Telegraph.

True, Sure Enough.

He—"Soup."

The Department of State at Washington has furnished us with the recommendations of the International American Conference on the various subjects considered, including those concerning uniform treaties for the extradition of criminals. In this department there are some radical changes of what has heretofore constituted international regulations on this subject. The sections relating to affording asylum, provide that no offender, who has taken refuge in the territory of a State, shall be surrendered to the authorities of any other State, except on demand of extradition, and in accordance with regular course of proceedings established for that purpose. The asylum is inviolable for political offenders; but the State has the duty of preventing refugees of this kind from accomplishing within its territory any acts whatever which may endanger the public peace of the nation against which the offense was committed. Such persons as may be charged with offense of a non-political character, and seek refuge in a legation, shall be surrendered to the local authorities by the head of the legation. But for political offenders, seeking for shelter at a legation, the legation shall be an asylum and shall be respected as such. The head of the legation, however, shall be bound to give notice to the government he represents, and said government has the power to demand that the refugee be sent away from the National territory, and the proper guarantee should be given for the exit of the offender without injury. In this there has been a departure from the established rule in international law as construed by the United States, wherein the Department of State has always held to the doctrine of non-interference in all cases of political offenders. Every nation shall be bound to deliver up to each other such offenders as have taken refuge within its territory when the nation asking has jurisdiction and the offense is of sufficient gravity to authorize extradition. In no case shall the extradition be hindered by the nationality of the offender. It is warranted in cases where the maximum penalty is not less than two years. In cases of convicted offenders where the penalty is not less than one year. No person shall be delivered up on extradition proceedings when the charge consists of duel, adultery, libel or treason. Political offenses, offenses attacking the internal or external safety of a State, or common offenses which are connected with them shall not warrant extradition. The determination of the character of these offenses belong to the nation upon which the demand for extradition is made. All the details of procedure are laid down in the treaties agreed upon by the Conference. The uniform code of international law disposes of many heretofore troublesome questions, and lays down rules that cannot be misunderstood. We shall take occasion hereafter to refer to the several treaties agreed upon, not only in regard to international law, but to the laws for the protection of patents and trade-marks, plan of arbitration, uniform system of weights and measures, and post dues, sanitary and quarantine regulations, and postal and cable communications. All of which were recommended by the Conference and submitted to the President of the United States.

The tariff law confirms and strengthens squarely the policy of protection to all American industries. The free list has been greatly increased. The great doctrine of reciprocity has been afforded an opportunity for our material gain and development. The American system never stood forth in so grand and imposing attitude before. It is the triumph of the American idea. There could be no clearer refutation of the democratic charge, that the tariff has increased the rates on everything, than the few remarks of Congressman McKinley at Millsburg, Ohio, a few days ago. He says: "There is not an item upon which protective duties have been laid that has not been reduced in price to the people who buy it. The Republican party fifteen years ago gave the country free coffee and tea, and has now given it free sugar. We have, as the result, a free and untaxed breakfast table. The duties under the bill are lower than those of any bill since 1861. We have reduced duties wherever it would not interfere with or injure home industry, and have increased it only where protection to our own manufacturing interests demanded it. The duties on wool have all been made protective. If, in 1883, you farmers of Ohio defeated the Republican party for a reduction of the wool tariff, as the Democrats then claimed, it is your duty now to vote for the Republican party. It has not only restored the tariff of 1863, but made it stronger by a high tariff on all substitutes for wool. The American market is the best in the world, and it has been made so and can only be so retained by protection. They say we have increased the price of everything. I would like to know what we have increased the duties on except champagne, brandy, plushes, velvets and the luxuries of the wealthy. These and farm products about comprise the list."

From the New York World we get the following as the creed and desire of the anarchists who propose to celebrate the hanging of the Haymarket murderer:

Abolition of all authority as being the virtual ownership of the ruled by the rulers.

Abolition of the ownership as being the authority of each owner over those who do not own what is owned.

Liberty can only be got by taking it in defiance of authority; that is, by rebellion.

The absolute and unlimited liberty of each secured by the absolute and unlimited liberty of all.

Obviously this statement is incomplete. Persons who give such formulation to their desires manifestly have a cause of quarrel with the multiplication table, because it will in no wise consent to let them make twice two equal five. They are or ought to be at war with the law of gravitation, by reason of its wicked obstinacy in forbidding men to soar into upper air at will. They should have launched a resolution at old Time himself for continuing his flight when their convenience demands that he should tarry. These are but disordered intellects toying clumsily with truth. The perfect, individual liberty they seek through the abolition of law can come only through the maintenance of law which shall restrain all wrong-doers from invading it. In any event law must always exist. If it be not the law of right the law which secures the liberty of each against invasion by the other, it will be the rude and despotic law of force and cunning. That which their distempered minds dream of as something to be secured through chaos is in fact secured through order, and can be secured in no other way so long as more than one person is in the world. The whole gospel of liberty is set forth in the opening clauses of the Declaration of Independence. Equality of right is the great truth, and it is the function of government and law to secure that equality, by restraining and punishing all invasions of right.

A writer in the last North American Review makes some sensible references to the rudeness and thanklessness of women in public places. He thinks the blame rests entirely on the men, and is only applicable to Americans. It is in right to take some valuable lessons from our trans-Atlantic brethren. In no railroad car in Europe, nor street car or omnibus, do men ever give up their seats to women. The result of this is that every railroad company or carrier puts on conveyances enough to accommodate travelers, and laws are enacted to compel the companies to provide seats for all passengers, and not to allow more passengers than there are seats. This method is better than ours, where, through a false notion of chivalry, Americans punish themselves by giving up their comforts for strangers. The Review writer asks with much truth and force: Why should a man who has paid $2 for a seat in a railroad car relinquish to a woman any more than a man in the orchestra of a theater should resign his $2 seat? Indeed, why should a man who has paid five cents for a street-car seat relinquish it to a woman merely because the company has sold her a seat for five cents and cannot deliver the thing sold? And why should women accept such privileges as if a matter of right? No refined woman would accept a postage stamp from a stranger without paying him for it; why should she accept what has cost him twice as much? Plainly because men have set the fashion of surrendering their seats under the plea of gallantry. I might pause here to show that the words "gallantry," "politeness," "courtesy," etc., are meant to apply only to acts of deference which involve no financial loss, and do not properly include the transfer of things which have been paid for; but space will not permit such a digression. A surrender of purchased seats and rights to elderly women or to women obviously ill would be bad enough; but the American method has come to include an indefinite extension of this habit which is pernicious in the extreme.

Occasionally at banquets where there is a genuine "feast of reason and flow of soul," we gather some rare gems of sentiment and thought. At the banquet tendered Louis Elkus, one of our pioneer merchants, by the congregation B'Nai Israel, on Tuesday evening, Hon. John W. Armstrong responded to the sentiment, "The Judiciary," in the following dignified and elegant manner. The remarks are so finished in style and abounding in true sentiment, that they should not be lost amid the clink of goblets. We give the following extract from the eminent jurist's remarks:

"The toast to the judiciary presents a subject which, in its origin, in its progress of development, in its purposes and bearing upon the prosperity and welfare of society, is too vast for a proper consideration in the short time allotted to me on this occasion; but it is a truth, that ever since the birth of civilization and civil society took shape and form, the judiciary, in all times, countries and nations, has been the great power which has protected the lives, liberties and property of the people from the rapacity and injustice of the crown in monarchical governments, and from legislative encroachments upon the constitutional rights and privileges of the people, and from the tyranny of political factions in republics; and in these degenerate days, when the pernicious influence of great individual wealth, associated capital, syndicates, trusts and imperious corporate power which has overshadowed the country, it is only an able, learned, honest, independent, fearless and impartial judiciary to whom the people can turn for the protection of their civil and political rights. To such a judiciary alone can be safely intrusted the promptly, justly and vigorously investigating and punishing of every species of crime, fraud and violence, and the exercise of the salutary power of compelling every man to a functional performance of his contracts and other duties to his neighbor and the State. These are grave judicial duties, and in troubled times they are not of the most popular character, for it frequently happens that the most wholesome and necessary laws for the protection of society are the object of temporary aversion, and sometimes of popular resistance; but a faithful discharge of these duties has, does and will command the respect and calm approbation of the people, when passion and prejudice shall have subsided. Society can never become so gangrened with vice, or the times become so corrupt, that the people will not honor, respect and sustain an able, learned, honest, fearless and impartial judge, who, in the discharge of his judicial duties, proceeds to judgment as if in the presence of the ministers of the land, both living and dead, and declares and enforces the law as he finds it, without regard to whether the parties litigant are powerful or weak, popular or unpopular, rich or poor! In this Republic, by wise constitutional provisions, the judiciary is made independent of the other departments of government, as a check upon legislative and executive tyranny born of political factions; and so may it remain forever! and it will not be forgotten that it is the shield which defies and protects the liberties and rights of the people in the present, and is the hope of the future! It is the palladium of our liberties!"

SOME UNWRITTEN HISTORY.

Sacramento in Embryo—How Government was Established from Chaos.

PART XVI.

October, 1849, closed pending a canvass for the adoption or rejection of the constitution recently framed at Monterey. Copies of that instrument were in print and circulated freely among the voters, and it was found to be thoroughly well considered and adapted to the wants of a new State. All the improvements in constitution making were adopted and made a part of that instrument, and the 13th of November, then next, was assigned as the day for voting to adopt or reject it. Sacramento city had become a fact accomplished. Its streets, alleys, and public squares were thoroughly established, numerous lots had been sold, not only near the fort, the seat of the commerce of our city at the beginning of the year, but at the embarcadero, then a busy mart for a large commerce, as well as on the principal streets. Our levee was flanked by vessels laden with all kinds of goods, including outfits for the miners, who sought our city for their necessities and luxuries.

Building materials were yet scarce and high, but this did not prevent stores and dwellings from going up on the lots sold. If boards and shingles could not be had, poles and canvas were at hand and were used for the protection of goods and as places for their sale. The passion for gaming became rampant, and the best buildings and tents on the most public streets and corners were devoted to games of chance. Money was scarce but bullion plentiful. Every miner coming from his claim had his sack filled with gold dust, and he paid for his goods or put down his stake on the green cloth in ounces of the precious metal. The City Council had struggled into existence, and by a vote of the people had a charter which gave it distinct powers. Before such vote it had exercised jurisdiction where it was doubtful. Now it had its power backed by local officers, including Courts, and it proceeded at once to prepare legislation. The City Council had at least three members of marked ability—Henry E. Robinson, P. B. Cornwall and E. F. Gillespie, and the others were in full accord in establishing a city government.

The City Council again met November 5, 1849, this time at the office of P. B. Cornwall. Present—A. M. Winn, President, with Councilmen Rogers, White, Gillespie and Cornwall. M. T. McClelland resigned his seat as a member of the City Council, and on motion of P. B. Cornwall, Jacob R. Snyder was elected to fill the vacancy, and he being present took his oath of office and seat. An ordinance (called by the City Council a bill) was introduced to enable the city to raise revenue to carry on its business, which was discussed, amended and laid over for further consideration to the next meeting. On motion of P. B. Cornwall, Doctors White and Chapman were appointed a committee to visit and examine all sick persons applying to the Council for assistance, and that the committee have full power to render all necessary aid, and draw upon the City Treasurer, through the President and Secretary, for the payment of all debts created by them.

Thus the City Council supplied a want which was felt more and more as the season advanced and inclement weather sent immigrants to the committee for assistance, and it was the beginning of a hospital service, with Dr. White as resident physician, carried on at the building formerly occupied by Sam Brannon as a store, near the fort. J. H. Harper having resigned his position as Secretary of the City Council, the members proceeded to vote by ballot for his successor, and William Glaskin was elected and he continued to act as such Secretary till the 27th February, 1850. The City Council again met November 7, 1849, at the office of P. B. Cornwall. The ordinance to raise revenue was taken up for consideration, and read by sections and adopted. This ordinance was entitled: "An ordinance to raise a revenue for Sacramento city."

The enacting clause was "Be it ordained by the President and Council of Sacramento city. Sec. 1 provided: "That on all lots, lands and improvements thereon there shall be assessed and collected the sum of fifty cents per annum on every hundred dollars assessed value thereof, and shall be due and payable immediately after the assessment roll, or any part thereof, which may have been approved by the Board."

Sec. 2 provided that the fiscal year shall commence April 1, 1850, and end April 1, 1851. The time between the passage of the ordinance and April 1, 1850, to be called one-half year and taxes to be collected accordingly.

Sec. 3. (a) Auctioneers shall apply to the President of the Council for license. (b) On granting the license it must issue and an entry be made by the Clerk, the license to go into the hands of the Collector. (c) The Collector to deliver the licenses to the auctioneers on the payment of $100 per annum, or in that proportion. (d) No license for less than 3 months. (e) Each month he shall make return to the President of the Council of the amount of sales of real and personal property, on which amount he was to pay one-half of one per cent.

By Sec. 4 the auctioneer was required to take his oath to support the constitution of the United States, faithfully perform his duty as auctioneer, and comply strictly with ordinances, rules and regulations of the City Council.

By Secs. 6 and 7, it was provided that all merchants and traders, exporters, brokers and exchange offices should be licensed. (a) On the capital invested, on each $100, 50 cents. (b) Retail dealers in liquors $300 per annum, and such retail dealers were required to give bond in such sum as the President of the Council might require, conditioned for the faithful preservation of order in or about his house, and that he will report all violations of the ordinance concerning the sale of liquors.

Sec. 9 provided that keepers of houses and tents where gaming tables were kept, shall pay a license for each table, $5 per month.

By Secs. 10 and 11 it was provided how such license should be issued and attested, and that for each conviction for offences against such ordinance, the party convicted should pay not less than $10 nor more than $500 and costs.

This ordinance seems sufficiently comprehensive. It will be remembered that there was then no statute authorizing such local legislation, and if there had been machinery provided for testing the validity of such an ordinance, it might have been held invalid. But all the local officers were in favor of enforcing some such regulations, and as there was no other tribunal to make regulations, these provisions were enforced as law. The merchant, the auctioneer, and the gambler took out their licenses, and the City Council were in funds. At the same meeting of the Council, an ordinance was presented creating public officers and designating their duties, which was laid over to the next meeting, which was held November 10, and at this meeting the ordinance was adopted. The title of the ordinance was:

Ordinance creating public officers and designating their duties. The offices provided for were—

1. Secretary. Bond $5,000. Salary $200 per month.
2. Assessor for personal property. Bond $2,000. Salary $400 per month.
3. Assessor for real estate. Bond $2,000. Salary $400 per month.
4. Collector. Bond $3,000. Salary $400 per month.
5. Treasurer. Bond $3,000. Salary $400 per month.
6. Coroner. For each inquest, $16.
7. Harbor Master. Bond $5,000. Salary $400 per month.
8. City Engineer. Each day's work for City Council $25.
9. City Attorney. Such amounts as the City Council may from time to time appropriate.
10. City Marshal. Bond $5,000. Salary $400 per month.

The First and Second Magistrates were constituted the judicial officers of the city.

The ordinance also prescribed the duties of each officer and gave them special instructions to obey all ordinances of the City Council. The ordinance also provided that all officers should be elected by ballot, and must give bonds to be approved by the President of the Council. This ordinance was approved November 11, 1849.

Thus the City Council established a system of city government by providing for city officers, and in the ordinance the duties of each were clearly provided for, and their salaries fixed. At the same meeting the Council resolved that all that part of the public levee situated between the north side of M street and the south side of N street be, and hereby is, set aside for a public steamboat landing. The Council again met on the same day (November 10th) at 6 o'clock at the office of Councilman Rogers, and Messrs. Chapman and Gillespie were constituted a committee to secure the printing of the ordinances.

Three petitions were presented to the Council, asking for the appointment of Harbor Master under the ordinance, by Mr. Warner, Mr. Norris and Mr. Clark, which were read and laid on the table. Mr. Cornwall then presented the petition of Mr. Miller for the office of City Marshal, which was read and laid on the table.

The Council thereupon proceeded to elect a Harbor Master by ballot, and R. J. Watson was declared elected.

The Council then elected Noble C. Cunningham as City Marshal and H. Miller, Deputy Marshal. A. Hadly was elected Assessor of Real Estate; John Leroye, Assessor of Personal Property; Captain Norris, Tax Collector; S. C. Hastings, City Treasurer; E. Crosby, Coroner; C. W. Coote, City Engineer; Murray Morrison, City Attorney.

The City Council, then feeling itself well grounded in its power, appointed Messrs. Winn, Gillespie and Chapman a committee to investigate and report on the propriety and feasibility of building a Council House.

The Secretary was then directed to notify the several officers-elect of the action of the Council, requesting them to prepare their bonds and submit them to the Council for its approval at its next meeting.

The City Council again met November 12. The following officers-elect presented their bonds, which were approved, and they severally took their oaths of office and entered on the discharge of their duties: Ringold J. Watson, as Harbor Master, $5,000; sureties, R. A. Pearis and G. W. Paul. Ambrose Hadly, Assessor of Real Estate, bond, $2,000; sureties, P. B. Cornwall and S. C. Hastings. Noble C. Cunningham, as City Marshal, bond, $5,000; sureties, D. R. Garrison, G. W. Paul and George Turner. John Leroye, Assessor of Personal Property, bond, $5,000; sureties, E. F. Gillespie and A. M. Winn. S. Clinton Hastings, City Attorney, bond, $5,000; sureties, P. B. Cornwall and Barton Lee.

On motion of P. B. Cornwall, it was Resolved, That the City Marshal be instructed forthwith to remove from Front street and the public levee all buildings, tents and shanties of every kind at the expense of the owners thereof, and that the property so removed be held until the expense be paid; if the expense be not paid in ten days, that the property be sold on twenty-four hours' notice.

And on motion it was further resolved, that the Marshal prevent the injury of all trees belonging to the city, and report all violations of these provisions to the Council, and for every offense the First and Second Magistrates shall fine the culprit not less than $20 nor more than $500, to be collected by the Marshal and paid into the treasury.

There is no record of any proceeding under this provision.

It was also, on motion, resolved, that all vessels be at once removed from the steamboat landing by the Harbor Master. This caused some friction between the steamboats and other vessels.

The President was then authorized to procure a seal for the authentication of his acts. This seal, if preserved, would now be a curiosity if it can be found.

November 13 an election was held throughout California to determine whether the constitution framed at Monterey should be adopted. The day was stormy, a blinding rain with heavy wind prevailing from the southeast all day. Not more than one-third of those entitled to vote attended the polls.

There were three polling places in Sacramento city, and the votes aggregated 1,863, and resulted:

For the Constitution, 1,850.

Against the Constitution, 13.

Governor.—Peter H. Burnett, 898; John A. Sutter, 429; W. S. Sherwood, 278; William M. Stewart, 78; John McDougal, 76.

Lieutenant-Governor.—John McDougal, 1107; A. M. Winn, 580; F. S. Lippitt, 84; J. A. Frisbie, 2.

Representative.—George N. Wright, 742; E. J. C. Kewen, 711; William E. Shannon, 545; Edward Gilbert, 406; Peter Holstein, 375; P. A. Morse, 332.

State Senator.—B. F. Lippincott, 618; T. L. Vermuele, 540; Nelson Taylor, 297; David S. Douglas, 524; Cal Lyons, 451.

The coming of the fourth year of The Old Homestead is being very ingeniously advertised in New York. Instead of the usual placards the shop windows are ornamented with huge pumpkins on which is stamped the announcement of the play's return to the Academy. In addition to this the Gothic covering which ornaments the dozen entrances to the big play-house is strewn with mounds of hay and farm implements of every description.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Goggles, an adaptation of Lablache's Les Petits Oiseaux, has begun a second week at Fifth Avenue.

Nat Goodwin looks more like a boy, a college boy, than an accomplished comedian and man of the world as he strolls about town these evenings in a bob-tailed sack suit of light London-make, a jaunty little brown derby and a slender cane. His only rival in boyishness of appearance is Hengy E. Dixey, so long known as "Young Dixey," and even he looks mannish by the side of "Little Nat." Goodwin seems quite able to hold his own, however, at the bar as well as in the corner of raconteurs. He looked curiously out of place a night or two ago in a group which Edgar Murphy, one of the tallest men about town; "Dick" Newcomb, the lawyer, and Eugene H. Earle, the boniface, were members. They are all rather sizeable men, and while Murphy isn't less than six feet four when he stands straight, Earle isn't less than six feet himself. The ex-Collector's stalwart and blue-eyed son is said to have joined the noble army of wine-boomers. He is one of the best pigeon shots in New York.

The following is one of Eugene Field's stories of musicians: When Ludwig Beethoven first visited the Austrian court he was 16 years of age. Well provided with letters of introduction to the Emperor Joseph, he proceeded alone to the palace, determined to play his way into the affections of the monarch. Admitted to the palace, he was met in an ante-chamber by a very clever gentleman who told him that the emperor could not well receive him then, but would be glad to have him present himself that evening for an audience in the Angarten. Attracted by the quiet and friendly demeanor of this person, young Beethoven engaged in conversation with him and presently discovered that he was the Emperor's barber, a discovery arising from the stranger's casual admission that he "shaved the emperor every morning." "Tell me," demanded the youth, "is he indulgent or severe?" "That depends," answered the barber; "when it comes to music matters he is strict enough." "Yes, I know what that means," said Beethoven, sneeringly; "he plays the piano a little, and strums away on the violoncello, and composes sonatas, but, between you and me, these big people don't carry their music studies very far after all." This honest expression of opinion seemed to amuse the barber mightily; he simply roared with laughter. That evening, at the appointed hour, Beethoven came to the Augarten and was shown into the music-room, where the emperor and a friend were seated in conversation. Intense was the young musician's horror to learn that the supposed barber and the emperor were one! But the emperor took the joke with such amazing good humor that Beethoven, for his part, was willing to forgive and forget. He seated himself at the piano and at the emperor's request improvised on a theme from Mozart's Zarastro. This he did so remarkably that his auditors were delighted. The emperor's companion could not restrain his joy; running across the room, he threw his arms about the youth, crying: "Such taste! Such skill! The youth who can so interpret the thought of another composer will one day be a great master in the art himself!" "Ah, but the air itself is so beautiful," said Beethoven, and then he added, "Mozart's music is divine!" "My lad," cried the emperor, beaming with delight, "do you know whom you are talking to? It is Mozart himself to whom you have been playing and whose lips have just predicted the great future that lies before you!"

Book Chat.

The library of Napoleon III, saved from the Tuilleries when it was in flames, is shortly to be sold at auction.

"Carmen Sylva," the poet Queen, gets up to write verses before daylight in the morning, writing until the sun is well above the horizon. The Queen is the author of vast quantities of prose.

Sara Jeannette Duncan is a young Canadian authoress who has been gaining a name for herself by a book of travels. She is quite a pretty woman, of slight figure, with brown hair and light-blue eyes.

Some manuscript fragments of Dante's "Divine Commedia" have been found at Sarzana in two parchment rolls. These fragments are believed to belong and are of the first copies of the poem ever made.

The income Twain enjoys from his books has added greatly to his wealth, and he is now rated a millionaire, quite a contrast to his early experience when he was "roughing it" in Nevada and California. He does not write as much as formerly, but still devotes several hours daily to his literary labors. It is understood that he is at work on a new book, and while he is getting old, his quaint humor is not. "I am still practicing on the public," said he, as I talked to him yesterday morning.

Boston has made the discovery that the original of Longfellow's "Village Blacksmith," who stood under the spreading chestnut tree and the muscles of whose brawny arms were strong as iron bands, is Henry Francis Moore, a blacksmith still living at Medford, Mass. The poet was often in Medford previous to writing the poem and was fond of chatting with Moore. The blacksmith is now sixty-one years of age, and is himself of the opinion that Longfellow had him in mind when he wrote his poem.

"What is the most common misquotation in the English language?" asked an inquisitive member of the Cogburn Club this morning as the purist entered. The answer, says the Utica Observer, came promptly: "When Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war." "Well, what is the matter with that?" asked the inquisitive member. "That is the most common misquotation in the English language," responded the purist. "I heard the late Roscoe Conkling say once that he won a basket of wine from Clement L. Vallandigham on that quotation. He wagered that Mr. Vallandigham could not tell what the correct words were, nor who wrote them, nor when they were written. And he won on every point. Now put yourselves in Vallandigham's place. What would you have done?" "I should have declined to make the bet," said the inquisitive member. "And I," "and I," came from all parts of the room. "But I should not," said the purist. "When Greeks joined Greeks then was the tug of war," is the correct quotation. It was written by Nathaniel Lee, an Englishman, about the year 1700. "Did you ever see it quoted correctly?" asked the inquisitive member. "Never in the newspapers," said the purist.

Among the Greeks, as among other nations, the first library consisted merely of archives, deposited, for the sake of safety, in the temples of the gods. Pisistratus, of Athens, was the first to establish a public library in his native city. Here he deposited the works of Homer, which he had collected with great difficulty and at great expense; and the Athenians themselves, true to their high nature, were at much pains to increase the collection. The fortunes of this library, by the way, were various and singular. It was transported to Persia by Xerxes, brought back by Seleucus Nicator, plundered by Sylla, and at last restored by the Emperor Hadrian. On the invasion of the Roman Empire by the Goths, Greece was ravaged; and on the sack of Athens they had collected all the libraries, and were on the point of setting fire to them when one of their chiefs interposed and dissuaded them from their design, observing at the same time that as long as the Greeks were addicted to the study of books they would never apply themselves to that of arms. The honor of having first established a public library in Rome, is ascribed by the elder Pliny to Asinius Pollio. The credit which he obtained thereby was so great that succeeding Emperors became ambitious to illustrate their reigns similarly. Augustus was himself an author, and in one of those sumptuous buildings called thermae, ornamented with porticoes, galleries and statues, with shady walks and refreshing baths, he testified his love of literature by adding a magnificent library, called after the name of his sister, Octavia. The Palatine Library, formed by the same Emperor, in the Temple of Apollo, became the haunt of the poets, as Horace, Juvenal and Peseus have commemorated. This library, having survived the various revolutions of the Roman Empire, existed until the time of Gregory the Great, whose mistaken zeal lead him to order all the writings of the ancients to be destroyed. The successors of Augustus, though they did not equally encourage learning, were not altogether neglectful of its interests. Tiberius founded a library in the new Temple of Apollo; Vespasian established one in the Temple of peace, and Ulpian Trajanus excelled all his predecessors in the founding the great Ulpian library. And in addition to the imperial libraries there were others to which the public had access in the principal cities and colonies of the empire.

Professional Chat.

A sensible witness in a Somerville Court objected to kissing a greasy copy of the Bible when he was called to take the oath, and asked if an attractive young Sunday-school teacher wouldn't do just as well.

A New York scientist claims to have discovered that constant motion of the mouth weakens the brain. This perhaps explains why the people who talk the most say the least. The above would apply to a number of our Sacramento lawyers and statesmen.

A lawyer who doesn't believe in mixing politics with the law, when asked once what kind of a Supreme Court the State of Michigan had, replied: "Well, there are two one-armed ex-soldiers, one Republican, a Democrat, a Granger, and two very fair lawyers on the bench."

A colored man came into the studio of one of Chicago's prominent artists a few days ago, says the Herald, and asked the price of portraits. The artist said: "Bust or full length?" "I think, sah, I prefers a group," said the negro. "How many in the group?" said the artist. "Oh, jes' a group of myself," was the reply. The artist's talent nor price for "group" one did not succeed in getting the order.

The Brooklyn prudes that object to Longfellow's "Building of the Ship," remind one of an incident in the life of Ralph Waldo Emerson. One day while gazing in admiration at a beautiful nude statue that had in every line an æsthetic thought, a lady said to him: "Mr. Emerson, don't you think the exhibition of this statue is indecent?" With an expression of surprise and disgust Emerson answered: "No, but your question is."

Mr. Justice Hawkins was once taken to be a member of the P. R. He was waiting to take his ticket at a railway station in Paris, at which there were a number of English roughs returning from the races, one of whom was very rude to him. The Judge remonstrated, whereupon the man became more insulting and said that if he would come outside he would give him "what for." Sir Henry, who wears his hair cut very short, then took off his hat, thinking that as the men were probably of the criminal classes they would recognize him, and quietly remarked: "Perhaps you do not know who I am?" Did the man in awestricken tones exclaim, "Awkins, by thunder?" No. What he said was: "S'lep me bob, a bloomin' prize fighter! Not me!" And the Judge was not further molested.

The Court was in session—a silence grim
Reigned supreme in the hall of the Law,
Then, the white-haired Judge, with impressive face, Heard the lawyers "against" and "for."

Passionate pleading the counsel made,
For a man's fair fame was in danger there;
And even the Judge seemed to smother a sob—
The "intelligent juror"—he slept in his chair.

Bearded men in the audience wiped
A tear from the eye seldom wet before;
And women trembled like aspen slim—
The "intelligent juror"—began to snore!

The counsel closed and a long-drawn sigh
Of pity was heard in that silence deep;
The Judge from his cheek wiped a something bright—
The "intelligent juror" was fast asleep!

The jury retired (for several days!)
'Tis said they reasoned—it so may be!
At length they returned and with one accord Remarked to the Court—"Judge, we can't agree."

One might suppose that will-making was anything but a merry occupation, and yet the drollery of the wills that some eccentric old fellows have left behind them could hardly be surpassed. Dean Swift could not have concocted a more bitter joke than that of the testator who, after citing the obligations he was under to a particular friend, bequeathed to him, at the bottom of the first page of his will, ten thousand—dollars, of course, thought the delighted legatee; but, on turning the leaf, the bequest was discovered to be ten thousand thanks. What a wet blanket for "great expectations!" Just as odd was the codicil of the death-stricken humorist who left to certain of his dear relatives "as many acres of land as shall be found equal to the area inclosed by the track of the center of the oscillation of the earth in a revolution round the sun, supposing the mean distance of the sun to be 21,600 semi-diameters of the earth from it." This was a century ago; and as the problem could not be satisfactorily worked out the legatees were kept at a mean distance from the property all their lives. A very neat reproach was conveyed in the will of an uncle who bequeathed eleven silver spoons to his nephew; with the remark, "if I have not left him the dozen he knows the reason"—the young scapegrace having stolen the twelfth spoon some time before.

Under the increasing latitude which has become the common practice in criminal trials under American jurisprudence, there is a grave danger that the ends of justice are often sacrificed. Many of the best jurists in this country have frequently urged that the practice in criminal Courts has steadily declined in point of fearlessness and exact administration of justice. When—as is too often the case—an important criminal trial is dragged out for weeks, if not months, and all the artifices known to unprincipled attorneys are used to defeat rather than to secure justice, there is undoubted opportunity for radical reform. Occasionally a salutary lesson comes from other governments in regard to the trial of criminal cases. The Birchell murder trial, which has just been concluded in Canada, furnishes a case in point. This was recognized as one of the most important in the annals of Canadian criminal jurisprudence, and yet so accustomed are British subjects to dispatch in criminal trials that the Birchell case occupied only a few days from start to finish. It should be remembered that criminal practice in the Anglo-Saxon countries is practically the same. It does not differ in any salient points, either as to jury selection or the law of evidence. The great difference between criminal trials in the United States and in British countries is in the latitude given to the opposing lawyers, especially in the selection of jury timber. That this latitude hinders rather than helps exact justice is an acknowledged fact. It is time to devise a remedy.—Chicago News.

Miss Florence Nightingale is a confirmed invalid. She is nearly seventy years old.

This country, with only one-twentieth of the world's population, consumes more than 33 per cent. of the world's production of luxuries.

A man in any kind of trouble will lie like blazes to secure sympathy. A woman, on the contrary, will tell a monumental lie to give sympathy.

Bismarck is not a good conversationalist, and he is a worse orator. While making a public address he sways himself backward and forward and twirls his thumbs.

Russell Sage keeps an old $1 bill—the first dollar he ever earned—in a glass box in his office. Mr. Sage thinks a great deal of it—as he does of his other dollars.

Pennsylvania Prohibitionists are hopeful in a small measure. At least they have nominated Mr. Gill for Governor.

Women are longer lived than men; a woman of twenty may expect forty-two years more of life, a man of the same age only thirty-nine years.

"Silver Dollar" Smith's saloon, in New York has one thousand silver dollars imbedded in the marble flooring, and a $20 gold piece in the middle.

Those prudes have evidently overlooked that wildly erotic poem of Longfellow's—Evelsior, where we find these lines:

"Oh stay, the maiden cried, and rest
Thy weary head upon this breast."

A public clock is to be erected in Philadelphia that will take one year to place in the tower. The minute hand is to be twelve feet and the hour hand nine feet in length; the bell will weigh 20,000 pounds; a steam engine will be put in the tower to wind up the clock.

The surest way to get hopelessly in debt is to accept presents. It will always keep one poor to respond to such obligations. This system of birthday, wedding and Christmas presents is nothing more nor less than an exchange for an equivalent. That is the way the world looks at it.

It takes a whole lot more to satisfy Republicans in Sacramento county than it does our friends, its enemy. Because there are a whole lot more Republicans than Democrats. If we had a lot more offices to bestow there might be fewer disgruntled fellows who claim to be members of the G. O. P.

A tree is a beautiful creation, the slow work of years. To plant trees is one of the surest means of benefitting posterity. Before cutting one down the necessity that compels such destruction should be fully established. When a country is stripped of trees it is but a step more to make it a desert.

The most eminent chemists and scientists declare that each adult human body carries enough phosphorus to make thousands of matches. It often occurs that an adult body does not contain grit enough to make one match. The vast amount of phosphorus must, however, account for the "flare ups" that occur when two adults of opposite sex clash.

Of all the passions that can take possession of the heart or brain jealousy is the worst. For many generations the chemists sought for the secret by which all metals could be changed to gold and through which the basest could become the best. Jealousy seeks exactly the opposite. It endeavors to transmute the very gold of love into dross of shame and crime.—Bob Ingersoll.

Col. George P. Davis, who has been chosen Director of the Chicago Columbian Fair of 1893, is a native of Massachusetts, his mother being a member of a well known family of Connecticut Quakers, and his wife a Southern woman. Col. Davis went to Chicago twenty years ago with Genl. Sheridan and soon after resigned from the army. He has since been active in the affairs of the Republican party in Chicago.

We heard comments from outsiders concerning our splendid demonstration last Saturday night, "that they would not march behind 'niggers.'" This reminds us of Private Miles O'Reilly's happy lit during war times which he gave in one of his characteristic war poems. It is as follows:

Some say it is a burning shame
To let the naysayers fight,
And that the right of being kilt
Belongs but to the white.
But every day in the year, my boy,
And every hour in the day,
My right to be kilt I'll divide wid him,
And devil a word I'll say.

It will be remembered that this was prompted by some race objections made to colored soldiers being allowed to enlist.

The Democratic candidate for Assessor of Alameda county, declares in a speech "that he will assess the rich and the poor alike." Now, the question remains, will he assess the poor at the same figures fixed for the rich? or will he take the penniless poor man as the standard and not assess the rich man at all? The gentleman is decidedly ambiguous.

Medical students in London are compelled to go through a course of four years' study, hospital attendance and lectures before being qualified to appear for the final examination. By an order of the General Medical Council of England the term of preparation has been extended to five years. If our medical students were compelled to undergo a like course of study and discipline, there would be a less number of "M. D." signs displayed.

Under a Congressional representation of one representative for each 180,000 votes, the next Electoral College will have 440 members, being 39 over the last. Of this increase 20 will be furnished by the new States. This apportionment will require 221 Electors to name the President. With the above apportionment the solid South would have 155 votes. In order for the Democracy to win it will require the vote of New York, Connecticut, Indiana and New Jersey, which under the above estimate would give 222 votes.

The Sacramento Mngwump is discouraged. He is in a sea of despondency. His Democratic ally refuses to recognize him. We suggest that he may either seek the protecting shelter of solitude, or go out upon the salt sea and throw himself into her arms, and perhaps he may have the consolation of realizing Longfellow's idea in the following:

"She starts—she moves—she seems to feel
The thrill of life along her keel,
And, spurning with her foot the ground,
With one exulting, joyous bound,
She leaps into the ocean's arms!"

* * * * *

Take her, oh, bridegroom, old and gray.
Take her to thy protecting arms,
With all her youth and all her charms!

The dismissal of Prince Bismarck was an evidence that the young German Emperor had determined to take a direct management in the affairs of the country instead of becoming acquainted with them after they had been filtered through the old-fashioned sieve of bureaucracy. His course since that time has still further indicated that he has a will of his own, which is likely to override the traditions of officialism. Such small matters—at least, in the eyes of the heads of departments—as the construction of railroad bridges and the laying of street car lines are receiving the Emperor's personal attention, and the people have already been the gainers. If he shall continue in this course he will doubtless find so many reforms necessary that but little time will be left for dreams of conquest and aggrandizement.

From the Ladies' Home Companion we glean the following bit of sharp irony. When we consider that this emanates from a woman there must be an expression of some experience:

Husbands ought always to wear a smiling and happy countenance. Should the care of providing the raw material to make a home weigh you down, never mind; always go home with a smile. Husbands have often lost the affection of their wives by looking careworn.

Be careful about your personal appearance; much depends upon that. Be sure that your hair is smoothly arranged, and your collar spotless, before presenting yourself at the breakfast-table. It is by attention to such little things that you may be able to retain the affection of your wife.

Don't complain if you are sick. A complaining husband often drives a woman to seek more congenial society. If you have the toothache—smile.

If you are embarrassed for want of funds to meet the necessary expenses of your household, always bear it with a cheerful and happy expression—always smile; your wife may be driven to spending her evenings elsewhere than at home, if you complain.

Keep up with the times. Your wife, having the care of the education of the children, naturally reads more than you. Don't let her. After you have worked twelve or fourteen hours a day, devote the remainder to keeping your mind in good trim, so that your wife may not find a more congenial spirit elsewhere.

Should your wife smoke or use tobacco in any form, it isn't best to object. Smiles will do more than frowns. Encourage her to smoke or chew, as the case may be, at home, or she may be driven to stay away from home. Personal liberty is always sacred.

By always paying strict attention to the above rules, and smiling continually, you will probably be able to retain the affections of your wife for a considerable time.

Hon. Joseph McKenna, Congressman from this District, arrived in Sacramento from Washington on Thursday, and spent the day visiting friends here. He was gratified at the political situation, and as soon as the State Committee will arrange his appointments he will enter actively upon his campaign. He will have meetings for this county arranged in due time.

Political.

As predicted in our last issue, the meeting and reception to Col. Markham Saturday night was in every way successful. Within four days the various Republican clubs were organized and uniformed. The demonstration is but indicative of the sentiment of the people of this Republican county. At this writing the only opposition—and it is very insignificant—is attempted to be inaugurated by a few who claim to be adherents to the Republican party. The only result of this matter will be unnecessary expense to the Republican candidates and the creation of personal feeling. The very fact that in Sacramento county the Republican organization is strong, constitutes it the object upon which political mercenaries prey. We are surprised that gentlemen identified with important interests and of recognized standing in this county should forget that a pettish strike against a portion of the ticket does not incur expense upon the whole. The Republican county ticket comes to the people from the largest political convention that ever assembled here, and it cannot be seriously said that any of our candidates lack in point of ability or integrity. The Republican Committee has been and is doing all that lies within its power to elect the gentlemen upon the ticket, and will resort to none but honorable means. So far, the campaign has been conducted with but little cost, and it is desirous that the gentlemen who have been nominated will not be subjected to unnecessary expenditures. Again, these side issues have always proven disastrous in their general governmental results, and the situation of municipal affairs at this moment strikingly exemplify this declaration. Men of the standing of Jos. Steffens, Louis Elkus, John Stevens, and ex-Mayor Gregory, who accepted regular Republican nominations—men against whom there should have been no adverse criticism—were defeated, and the methods that were resorted to to defeat them are certainly not commendable. Against each a false issue was raised which had a following of some respectability; yet it was that the position was taken advantage of by the political mercenaries, and these men were simply knifed. On election day it can be established that money was corruptly used against them, and yet citizens who should have exercised better political judgment were the catspaws used to rake in the corruption fund and to humiliate by defeat gentlemen who enjoy the confidence and respect of the people.

It has resulted in this: that the administration of our municipal affairs does not command the respect of our own people, nor is it respected by people elsewhere in the State. Incoming capital is compelled to kneel and abjectly solicit for placement in Sacramento city, and it is a matter of notoriety—it has been openly charged and not denied—that an important fiscal position was disposed of by barter. The result, should it be successful, of side issues in county politics, will be to extend this evil and to place in the hands of professional politicians the power to feather their nests at the expense of the candidates of the party. Again it is, there is an element of gross inconsistency with some; there are gentlemen enthusiastically in favor of Mr. Markham, and who are willing, it would seem, to cripple his administration by the election of a Democratic Legislature.

On next Monday night Congressman W. W. Morrow will address the people in the Old Pavilion, the Republican headquarters, and appropriate arrangements for his reception are being made. Congressman Jos. McKenna arrived from Washington on Thursday, and spent a few hours in the city. The arrangements for his canvass have not yet been perfected.

Secretary of the Board of Trade.

G. G. Pickett has resigned his position of Secretary and Attorney for the Board of Trade on account of removal from the city, and the position has been filled by the appointment of Albert M. Johnson, a well known attorney of this city. Mr. Johnson has heretofore filled the position, and from his knowledge of commercial law and experience in that particular line, no better selection could have been made. As with his predecessor, Mr. Johnson will enjoy the absolute confidence of the members of the Board.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Sacramento theatre patrons may expect a great treat on the evenings of October 13th and 14th, when Dixey's Adonis and The Seven Ages will be given with full company and effects. These are the finest plays in their line on the stage. The Metropolitan is scarcely large enough to hold the people who desire to witness Adonis and The Seven Ages.

Wednesday and Thursday nights of this week U. S. Mail was presented to good houses at the Metropolitan. There is absolutely nothing in the play, and the author expresses it when he says that the hammer, saw and jackplane are the predominant features. The pen had little work on this production. There are several exceedingly clever artists in the company. Frank David is an excellent actor and shows a wide range of dramatic art. Georgie Parker is a fine dancer, but has a poor voice for singing. Marie Bockwell is a real Alpine warbler.

Tricks in Trade.

There are often funny things in briefs and arguments of counsel. In the Albany Law Journal of a recent date, there appears an extract from a brief of counsel in the case of People vs. Gilson, 109 N. Y. 389, which was an action concerning the validity of the law prohibiting traders from throwing in presents as a consideration of buying goods. An extract from one of the briefs reads:

Doubtless, Noah had a discount for cash on his gopher wood and pitch materials for the ark, and obtained special rates from the menagerie and feed men of his day. A close examination of the narrative shows too, that although Esau sold out to Jacob for a mess of pottage, that affectionate brother added bread also to the bargain. Solomon himself makes a pretty shrewd contract for his temple with his neighbor Hiram (Kings 5) on a food article basis, but seems (1. Kings, 9-10) to have given as a prize premium or reward, some undesirable real estate. The Tyrians and Carthaginians were too good traders not to have carried a supply of 'extra inducements' and 'job lots' in their annual excursions to Britain; and tradition has it that neither the pious Puritan nor the honest Hollander neglected to add an extra gallon or two when buying a few miles of Indian land for a head dress or a frying pan. Defendant's method is a development of the fond utility of the age. Beginning with the plain and then the ornamented or colored business card; observing that these were soon cast aside or forgotten to make patrons more mindful he presents tasteful chromos, such as brighten many a humble home and add a gleam of art's beauty to the tenements of the poor. Becoming more practical, he now presents little household articles, of trifling cost to him as he bought in quantity, on which he makes no profit, but which he uses as a means of advertising his teas and coffees. Some—those the old-fashioned—spend a percentage of profit in 'dodgers,' hand bills and glaring sign boards, that litter up and obstruct thoroughfares, and are public nuisances; but the enterprising and wide awake defendant places the same percentage in those little table luxuries that please children, lighten the burden of weary housewives, and are a perpetual, self-acting advertisement of the good taste and good sense of the giver. The milkman furnishes you with the can or the patent bottle in which his milk comes fresh from the farm; the grocer sends home his butter in neat wooden plates, useful for a dozen other purposes; the butcher supplies lard in handy tin pails; the confectioner has charming bon bon boxes; the fish man has quaint wee kegs for his oysters; you buy your jellies and jams in patent preserving jars with rubber bands and all; at the soda fountain you get tickets at five cents each or twenty-five for a dollar; the restaurant keeper offers commutation tickets and gives bread with two fish balls. There never was a horse trade without something 'to boot,' while free lunch is a natural institution found in every retail liquor place from (and including) Maine to San Francisco."

The judges submitted this brief to their wives, and the defendant won.

THINGS WORTH KNOWING.

Heaving the Lead.

Everybody has heard the expression "heaving the lead." How is it done and why? In the first place, the lead is especially prepared for the purpose, and is a hexagonal pyramid, varying in weight from five to fifteen pounds, and has a cavity in the bottom, into which soap is pressed for the purpose of bringing up samples of the ground at the bottom of the sea, so its nature can be ascertained. In heaving the lead on a sailing vessel, the leadsmen station themselves well forward near the cathead. On steamships there is generally a small platform at the bow from which the lead is heaved. The leadsmen whirled the lead around by the line and casts it as far in front of the vessel as possible. By the time the vessel has progressed as far as the lead the latter has reached the bottom, and the slack of the line being taken in until it is taut, the depth of water is shown by the fathom figure on the line at the surface. The lead has saved many a ship.

How Oranges Are Sized.

The ring chain sizer for sizing oranges is quite an invention, and sorts out the oranges by means of passage over rings of various sizes, the fruit of the same size dropping into one receptacle. It can be operated by one man, and 400 boxes of oranges sorted in one day. The other sizer is a novelty—simply constructed, convenient and easily operated. A lad can run out 100 boxes per day on it. This sizer conveys the oranges to circles of different diameters and drops them according to size altogether rapidly and without bruising them. Both are operated by turning a crank.

The Growth of Our Sea-Beaches.

As the tide falls the sand laid bare is rapidly dried by the wind and carried above high-water mark. Then, safe beyond the reach of the waves, the minute particles are borne still farther from the water, and striking against some piece of driftwood, brush or tuft of grass, quickly build a hillock. * * * In time, as the beach grows seaward and the dunes increase in number, those of earlier formation, which are somewhat protected from the breeze, catch a few seeds, and tufts of grass begin to grow upon them. Thus have the beaches grown. First a sand flat built by ocean waves and currents; then a series of low, shifting dunes; next sheltered hillocks, on which grasses and shrubs fasten their protecting roots; succeeding the latter, a growth of small cedars and pines; and, finally, as centuries roll on, majestic forest trees raise their spreading tops, and shelter a dense undergrowth.

Suicides in China.

Advices from China give an account of a curious suicide on a large scale. A number of young girls in Hong Kong had taken vows of celibacy and banded themselves into an organization called the Society of Purity. But one of the number was betrothed by her parents to a young man of the town. Then the whole band went off together and drowned themselves in the river—an example of female consistency and solidarity which is dreadful to think of. Yet the story is undoubtedly true. Suicide is very frequent in China, and an intending felo de se finds it easy to obtain companions. Thus some years ago an accomplished young lady of Canton, who had been unfortunately married to a coarse and stupid husband, was bewailing her fate to a party of sisters and female cousins and declared her intention of committing suicide. On this the young ladies declared that, since such was married life, they would die too; and so the whole bevy of them joined hands together, and, walking into a fish pond, deliberately drowned themselves. Again, three men, imprisoned in Hong Kong jail on a charge of piracy, determined to make away with themselves rather than have the bother of a trial. At some height in the cell where they were imprisoned was a small window, guarded by two iron bars. From the positions in which they were found in the morning, it would seem that the third man had assisted the two others in hanging themselves from the bars by their cues; that then he had cut down one of them by gnawing through the cue with his teeth, and, using the dead body as a stool to be afterwards kicked over, he had contrived to suspend himself. And all this had been done so quietly as not to attract the notice of a sentinel who was pacing outside the window. A very curious series of suicides took place in Shanghai in 1869. The parents of a young lady, lately married, fell into difficulties and applied to her for assistance. Her husband allowed her to give them a coat to pawn. The daughter, being anxious to render further aid, without the knowledge of her husband, secreted $16 in the pocket of the coat. The old man did not discover this, but took the coat to a pawnbroker, who, noticing the money on unfolding the garment, kept his own counsel, and quietly advanced $2. Soon after the husband discovered that the daughter had given $16 to her parents, and made so much noise about it that the young lady disposed of herself by hanging.

In this way the news of the robbery committed by the pawnbroker became known to the parents, and the old mother took the matter so much to heart that she poisoned herself with opium. Lastly, the pawnbroker, getting alarmed on hearing that his dishonesty had caused two deaths, drowned himself in a well.

The following instance may be regarded by the superstitious as sufficient warning against all jests on such a grim subject as grim death. It is related by Bolton, the English actor and author. Sim Reeves, the famous tenor, was once playing the Squire in the "Mother Goose" pantomime, and at the very moment when he was walking off the stage singing:

My wife is dead, there let her lie,
She's at rest and so am I.

a man tapped him hurriedly on the shoulder and whispered: "Sorry to tell you, Mr. Reeves, that Mrs. Reeves is dead. Mrs. Balyntyne directs me to tell you to come home immediately." Reeves was completely prostrated by the suddenness of the announcement, and was first to notice the odd coincidence that connected the little wayward song with his wife's death.

A Neosho (Kan.) county farmer sent this mixed order to a Chanute merchant: "Send me a sack of flour, five pounds of cofe and one pound of tee. My wife give birth to a big baby boy last night, also 5 pounds of corn starch, a screwdriver and a fly trap. It weighed 10 pounds and a straw hat."

"We had more fun at the party the other night than I ever saw in my life," said a little girl to her mother.

"What was the cause of your hilarity?" inquired the interested parent.

"One of the girls fell through a chair, and everybody laughed but me."

"Why didn't you laugh?"

"I—I—I was the little girl who fell through the chair."

PROPRIETORS OF

CAPITAL NURSERIES,

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of R. S. McClure, an insolvent debtor.

R. S. McCLURE having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said R. S. McClure is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said R. S. McClure, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent, to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use. And the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. John W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 31st day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated Sept. 25, 1890.

He Had Nothing to Say.

A prominent surgeon at a recent banquet told the following story on a well-known young physician who was present. Calling the attention of all present to the young man, he said: "I have a good joke on John. He had a very bad case of pneumonia which he had treated very well. His patient pulled along very well and was finally nearly well. John told him so, but said that in three days he would call again to see if anything further was needed. In three days he called. His patient's brother met him at the door with a long face, and said: 'I have sad news for you, doctor; brother is dead.' John stood there for a minute and thought: 'Well, how am I going to get out of this. I have got to let myself down easy.' He began to run over in his mind all the causes that might produce a sudden death, and finally decided on one that he thought would do. He said: 'Such things happen now and then. Sometimes one cause and sometimes another brings it on. Now, I expect that with your brother a clot of blood suddenly formed in the heart and killed him.' He rattled this off and kept talking for several minutes without giving his listener time to say a word. He stood with his mouth open and gazed at the doctor as he fired technical terms at him. Finally, as John stopped to take a breath, he said in the most serious tone: 'No, doctor, that ain't what killed brother. He went down to the canal and fell in and was drowned.' John did not say a word, but left, as the 'horse was on him,' and has never had the heart to send in his bill."—Louisville Commercial.

How She Brought Him Around.

Softly shone the subdued light of the solitary gas jet in the parlor of the Bilderback mansion on the avenue, and soft was the voice of the abashed young Erasmus Shackelford, who sat on the edge of his chair, mopped his heated face and smiled with a kind of papier-mache smile at the entrancing young woman in the dazzling aureole of whose auburn hair he had fluttered in agonizing captivity for months and months. "Miss Viola," he said, clearing his throat and speaking with every inflection of a man about to say something, "you will not be surprised, I presume, if I—if I express the—the feeling, the—the opinion as it were, that it's pretty hot this evening?" Erasmus gave his face another frenzied swipe with his handkerchief and subsided into palpitating silence. "No," replied Miss Viola, with a smile that brought a large ecstatic lump of something or other up into his throat, "I am not surprised, Mr. Shackelford. You made the same observation early in the evening." "Y—yes," he gasped. "I believe I did. It—it was not an entirely new remark. In fact, it was a kind of a—of a chestnut, I suppose." The agitated youth made another effort to crush down the lump in his throat. "And I feel—I feel, Miss Bill Viola—as if I were a—a kind of—of observation myself that was getting tiresome. Haven't I been—been observed here a little too often? Do I seem to be a—a chestnut?" and as he moved his handkerchief over his glowing face in tremulous jabs his voice took on a despairing sound—"a sort of—of roasted chestnut." "No, Erasmus," slowly answered the maiden. "When a chestnut is roasted it pops." The conscientious historian is bound to record the fact that at this point Erasmus immediately popped.

"Happy Marriages."

Mrs. Helen E. Starrett writes in the October Forum: One of the greatest foes to happy marriages is the existence of the mercenary spirit on the part of parents and daughters. Nothing will so effectually remove it as the possession by young girls and women of satisfactory, honorable, remunerative occupations, and the countenance and approbation of society in the pursuit of them. Margaret Fuller said: "No woman can give her hand with dignity until she has learned to stand alone." The day is near at hand when the thoroughly educated woman will be the one admiringly described by Goethe as "able, if necessary, to be both father and mother to her children." Here will be found the true conditions for forming love-inspired marriages.

Others have knocked at the gate of my heart, Saying, "Fair one, let me in, I pray." But you boldly scaled the walls at a bound, Saying, "I'm here, and I've come to stay."

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting: You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 15th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 15th day of July, A. D. 1890.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,
Attorney for Plaintiff. ang16—9t.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. D. Bennett, an Insolvent Debtor.

J. D. Bennett having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. D. Bennett is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal, of the said J. D. Bennett, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 17th day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, Sept. 13th, 1890.

W. C. VAN FLEET,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Man's Perversity.

The perversity of man is amusingly illustrated by an anecdote told by Max Muller in the course of a recent lecture at Oxford:

I was lecturing at the Royal Institute in London. The audience there is the most enlightened and critical one has to face in the world, but it is mixed. It being necessary to prove that Hebrew was not the primitive language of mankind, I had devoted a lecture to this subject. I explained how it arose, and placed before my audience a genealogical tree of the Aryan and Semitic languages, where everybody could see the place which Hebrew holds in the pedigree of human speech. After the lecture was over one of my audience came to thank me for having shown so clearly how all languages, including Sanskrit and English, were derived from Hebrew, the language spoken in Paradise by Adam and Eve!

The learned philologist was overwhelmed with dismay, and thinking the fault lay in his inability to elucidate his point told Professor Faraday he must really give up lecturing. But the distinguished physicist consoled his friend with an anecdote from his own experience. He said: "I have been lecturing in the institution many years, and over and over again, after I have explained and shown how water consists of hydrogen and oxygen, some stately dowager has marched up to me after the lecture to say in a confidential whisper, 'Now, Mr. Faraday, you don't really mean to say that this water here in your tumbler is nothing but hydrogen?'"

Do you Rizzle?

Do you rizzle every day? Do you know how to rizzle? One of the swell doctors in town says that it is the most wonderful aid to perfect health. "I masticate my food very thoroughly at dinner," he says, "and make sure to have my family or friends entertain me with bright talk and plenty of fun. After dinner it is going to rizzle. How do I do it? I retire to my study and, having darkened the room, I light a cigar, sit down, and perform the operation. How to describe it I don't know, but it is a condition as nearly like sleep as sleep is like death. It consists in doing absolutely nothing. I close my eyes and try to stop all action of the brain. I think of nothing. It only takes a little practice to be able to absolutely stifle the brain. In that delightful condition I remain at least ten minutes, sometimes twenty. That is the condition most healthy to digestion, and it is that which accounts for the habit animals have of sleeping while eating. I would rather miss a fat fee than ten minutes' rizzle every day."

"THE KING'S TOUCH."

In England, two centuries ago, popular superstition credited the "Royal Touch" with curing scrofula. These superstitious practices have now become obsolete, and in their place we have a scientific remedy in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which eliminates the impurities from the blood by the natural channels, thereby cleansing the system from all taints and impurities from whatever cause arising. It is truly a royal remedy, world-famed and the only liver, lung and blood remedy guaranteed to benefit or cure in every case, or money paid for it will be refunded. As a regulator of the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, "Golden Medical Discovery" cures all bilious attacks, indigestion and Dyspepsia, Chronic Diarrhea and kindred ailments. As an alternative, or blood-purifier, it manifests its marvelous properties in the cure of the worst Skin and Scalp Diseases, Salt-rheum, Tetter, Eczema, and Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, as well as Lung-scrofula, commonly known as Pulmonary Consumption, if taken in time and given a fair trial. WORLD'S DISPENSARY MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, Proprietors, Buffalo, N. Y.

$500 REWARD

is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of Catarrh in the Head which they cannot cure. By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Remedy cures the worst cases, no matter how bad, or of how long standing. Fifty cents, by druggists.

Hayseed Risin'.

We kin all of us remember how along about September
The papers used ter tell about the caucus or the fair,
End them fellers from the city used ter git almighty witty
On the feller with the duster what had hayseed in his hair.

They lied fin in legislators with the man what raised pertaters
If by any hook or crook or chance elected and sent there,
End the reportorial friskers used ter comment on the whiskers
End the carpet-sack of Billson, what had hayseed in his hair.

Yes, b'gosh! he rid his pass out, end he used ter blow the gas out;
End he used ter drink hard cider when he went out on a tear.
End he used ter pinch a dollar till the buzzard used ter holler, End the man cut up ree-e-diklous what had hayseed in his hair.

But, by gum! ef you've been readin, you observe a strange purceedin'—
It's the feller with the chin whiskers that is slowly gittin' there;
End it won't be too surprisin', ef by slowly
organizin',
Old parties may wake up tew find the Hayseeds in their hair.

When the fashions change, you fellers will all carry green umbrellers, End trousers wide across the seat tew make the dudelets stare;
In them times, ef you pass muster you must wear a linen duster, End ef you want tew throw on style, put hayseed in your hair.
—A. T. Worden, in Judge.

One of Watterson's Stories.

One of Henry Watterson's stories relates to reconstruction days in the South. Col.
Oglethorpe of South Carolina:

"Yo' have no idea, sah, of the aggravating sukkumstances of those unfo'tunate times. Do yo' know what the demd govah-ment did at Columbia, sah? Why, they sent down a long, demd Pennsylvania Dutchman to be our postmastah, sah; yes, sah.
And the first thing he did was to abolish the credit system entirely, sah. Struck a demd develish blow at ouah liberties. Cunnel Stahbottle, sah, came up to the window and gave this demd Pennsylvania Dutchman two letters.

"Put stamps on those letters, sah!" said Cunnel Stahbottle, 'and charge the same to my account, sah!"

"Now, what do yo' suppose that demd cawpet-bagga, said? He had the impudence to inform Cunnel Stahbottle, sah, that the postoffice was run on a strictly cash basis, sah. Of course, the Cunnel shot him dead on the spot. What else could he do, sah?
And do you know, sah, so much fuss did the govahment make ovah that demd Pennsylvania Dutchman, sah, that it took our utmost efforts, sah, to keep the Cunnel out of litigation."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

Within this week Sacramento city witnessed two events of political significance—the parades and receptions to Congressman Morrow and Senator Stanford. On Monday Mr. Morrow arrived here and after a very short notice arrangements were perfected that resulted in a large meeting in the Old Pavilion. Mr. Morrow was listened to with marked attention, and his exposition of the tariff and silver laws were so clearly made that they were universally commended as being profitable and interesting. Upon the next day at noon the following dispatch was received by Mr. Steffens, of the Executive Committee of the State Central Committee, and Mr. Davis, the Chairman of the County Central Committee, from Mr. Stump, the Chairman of the State Committee: "Senator Stanford will reach Sacramento early this evening. Please make best arrangements you can in limited time to meet him." Immediately upon receipt of these telegrams notifications were sent to the heads of the various Clubs, and committees were appointed to arrange the details. The result was that the Senator was received at 8 o'clock by a full turnout of the members of the Clubs and other citizens, and after the parade addressed an audience that completely filled the Pavilion building. This event, while political in one sense, partook in a great measure of a reception by the people to a distinguished citizen. It has never been paralleled in the history of this city except by the reception to General Grant, in the State Capitol, when he returned from his trip around the world, and we venture it will be many years before a similar honor will be tendered to a citizen. Regardless of station or class, the people of this city gathered to express their appreciation of the life work of Leland Stanford. Most of the members of the Clubs that marched had risen from boyhood to manhood since his residence in this city, and knew the man only through the work he had performed in the interest of humanity, education and labor. They realized that through his influence, perhaps more than through that of any other man in the State, the rates of labor had been kept up; that at no time had he been deaf to the appeal of merited charity; and that his bounty has placed it within the reach of the humblest youth to receive upon an equal footing the educational advantages heretofore only attained by the wealthy. This demonstration was simply a token of respect.

Since our last writing a couple of very small political heads have bobbed up in this county, and the Republican party are the spectators of a Punch and Judy show, it would seem. The Democrats after months of travail have brought forth a complete ticket, yet to do so were compelled to draw upon the candidates nominated by the Republican Convention. The other ticket comes from a more shaded quarter, and it would seem that the gentlemen who formulated it felt that their proceedings should be kept from the public eye. The Republican ticket was chosen by a convention composed of over two hundred delegates, and among them were some of the most prominent men in the county. They were selected at an open primary by the body of the party, and it would seem that a majority of a convention of that size should be credited with good judgment and honesty, and that their judgment should be superior and wider than a few who have drawn a line about them, and declared that within that little circle is contained the political purity of the county. We esteem it there should be the same honor in politics as in business, and that when a man pledges himself at a party primary, or as a delegate to a convention, that he will abide by its determination, that he should do so in good faith. The writer was chosen without his solicitation and by unanimous assent Chairman of the Republican County Committee, and it will be assumed reasonably that every delegate holding a seat in that body intended that such selection should be made; yet regretfully, we see men who were in part responsible for the choice, exerting themselves to cripple the administration of the committee; and to compel it, perhaps, to subject the gentlemen upon the ticket to unnecessary expense and harassment. If there is anything that involves the capacity or integrity of any one of the candidates against whom this blow is directed, it would seem that common justice should prompt that it be made public, and that the candidate and the committee of the party, as well as Republican citizens, should have an opportunity to defend. It is bad enough for the committee to be compelled to defend the nominees against the strikers and leeches, unfortunately so numerous in this community, and it seems unreasonable that an element should be added by gentlemen of acknowledged respectability, that will simply be an instrument to be taken advantage of by those whose political sentiment is governed by the amount of money they receive. As we stated last week, the Republican Committee is conducting an honorable and open campaign, and so far it has been able to show a record that the fight has been one characterized by economy. Every barrier possible has been placed to keep the hands of the mercenaries out of the pockets of the candidates and the committee feel that its policy should receive the endorsement of all good citizens. There can be no ticket that can be nominated by any convention but what some of the candidates will be unsatisfactory to some of the members of the party, and for various reasons; yet we esteem it that respect should be paid to the determination of such a body as presented this ticket to the people, and the intimation should not be made that their unanimous action was the result of corrupt control.

One of the best nominations made by the Republican State Convention is that of William Beckman, for Railroad Commissioner, in this district. Mr. Beckman has the advantage of a long residence here, of large business experience and of a wide circle of friends and acquaintances—one extending throughout the State. He located in this city in early days, and established himself in business. Afterward he engaged in farming and fruit raising in the county, and while so engaged was elected a member of the Board of Supervisors at a time when the county was almost hopelessly in debt. At the close of his term of office, the debt was extinguished, and largely was this satisfactory result due to his business abilities. On the collapse of the Odd Fellows' Savings Bank, the People's Bank was built upon its ruins, and the depositors of the Odd Fellows Bank choose Mr. Beckman President of the new bank. He so administered his trust that from financial chaos there was built a prosperous fiscal institution. The undertaking at the outset seemed hopeless and one which few could have successfully managed. A man of that character is particularly fitted to fill the office of Railroad Commissioner.

The condition of the street railroads in numerous places is dangerous for vehicles, and for life and limb. It is not an unfrequent occurrence that light wagons have wheels wrenched off by coming in contact with protruding portions of the railroad tracks. A few days ago we witnessed the wrecking of a wagon, and the violent fall of a lady and gentleman, the former with an infant in her arms. That those parties were not seriously injured is not to the credit of the street railroad proprietors. The law makes it obligatory upon the street railway owners, to properly pave and secure the tracks two feet on each side of the rails, as well as between them. A glance at the present condition of these railways will convince any one how little regard is given to the public welfare in these matters. We ask, has the public any rights those street railroad owners are bound to respect?

It seems that our recent issue of street improvement bonds do not find ready takers at the established prices. There was an implied, if not direct express understanding when the people voted for the issuance of these improvement bonds, that the Funded Debt Commission would—devote some of its accumulations towards floating these bonds. Up to the present time these "financiers" have shown no disposition to aid the scheme. On the contrary, the Board evidently prefers to aid the old bond creditors, by redeeming the non-interest bearing bonds which fell due in 1888, and from which source the city could apprehend no fear, as they cannot be enforced and are likely to remain a non-commercial commodity for over twenty years to come, if this Board would only let them alone, and not appreciate their value by making efforts to redeem them at a figure far beyond their real value. It would be much more in accord with the spirit of the times to aid the city in making needed improvements, rather than having such an interested and watchful care over the "poor bond holders."

One of the serious complications that the International American Conference considered was the law of marriage. The various conflicting laws of different States represented in the great Conference, relating to the subject of marriage, was a source of no little concern. If marriage is contracted in this country with certain solemnities, and there are forms and solemnities different in other countries of the Conference, it became necessary to decide whether parties entering into the contract in their territory, according to the laws of their own nationality, are or are not entitled to have such marriage treated as valid everywhere; and it was necessary to decide whether a foreigner here, or a North American out of the United States, must in his marriage observe the formalities of the law of his own country or the formalities of the place in which it is celebrated. There were so many complications growing out of this subject that the Conference finally agreed upon a basis of action. The legal capacity of all persons shall be governed by the laws of their domicile. The law of the place of residence of a person shall determine the requirements necessary to constitute a domicile of said residence. The domicile of a husband and wife shall be that which the couple have adopted and in default of such adoption, their domicile shall be that of the husband. The capacity of persons to contract marriage, the formalities, the continuance, and the validity thereof shall be governed by the law of the place where the contract is entered into. The contracting States, however, shall not be bound to recognize a marriage celebrated in one of them, should any of the following impediments exist: Want of age on the part of the contracting parties, it being required that the man be fully fourteen years and the woman twelve years of age. Relationship in direct line by consanguinity or by affinity, either legitimate or illegitimate. Relationship between legitimate or illegitimate brothers and sisters. Killing by any one, either as principal or accomplice, of one of the married parties for the purpose of marrying the survivor. Former marriages not lawfully dissolved. The rights and duties of married parties in everything concerning their personal relations shall be governed by the laws of the matrimonial domicile. Should the married parties change their domicile, their rights and duties shall be governed by the laws of their new domicile. The law governing the marriage contract shall determine the legitimate filiation and the legitimation of subsequent marriage. A change of domicile does not offset the relation of husband and wife to their property acquired before or after the change. Our International Conference has embodied these provisions in its Uniform Code of International Law. Heretofore there has been many conflicts concerning the application of international law. The recent Conference has adopted a Code that seems to tend largely towards adjusting differences of opinion on very many questions that are likely to arise between nations. While this body was not intended as a body of jurists, it has met and disposed of a number of knotty problems.

LYING.

Those expert in the bad art know that they should be woven of many threads of truth, with a few of error. The worst lies, then, are those which come the nearest to being true, and yet are not true. For, in a single word, or in the mere reflection of a word, so in a lie, though there may be a long story, the efficient point lies, usually, in a small compass. All the rest may be true but that little, and yet that little will be as sharp and deadly as if not a word of the whole had been true. A lie is bad in proportion to the amount of truth there is to drive it home. When reports are circulated, conversations are reported, and actions are represented, the very truth of the most of the statement will cause the least essential variation from the truth to be the most harmful. And hence, the very worst lies that can be forged, are those which to an ordinary observer are every whit true.

Nay, further, if one is disposed to do the devil's work, he may, in the dealings of society, report men's very words and actions, so that the terms of the report shall not vary from the exact fact, and yet be guilty of the grossest falsehood. For it is not enough to give the literal versions of a man's words; that does not constitute an act. There are a thousand other things that attend a man's least conduct. Let a man only mean to convey a wrong impression, let him, intending to do it, actually succeed, and the fact that he produced a false impression by the way in which he spoke the truth, only enhances his guilt. Suppose one to say of his friend, jocosely, "he is a singular man." By and by, the listener hears the enemies of the man speaking evil of him, and he steps in and says, "You are not alone, gentlemen, in your suspicions; his best friend said to me, 'Mr. A. is a very singular man.'" Every word is true; but the impression conveyed by the time of telling it, by the purpose for which he tells it, by the way in which he tells it, by the significance of the inflection of his voice in telling it, makes the truth cut like a sword. Nothing lies like the truth.

Words depend so much for their meaning upon the person, the tone, the gesture, the look, the time, the place—in short, upon the whole circumstances of their utterance—that he only reports them truly who seeks to produce in the mind of the hearer the impression which the one who uttered them first meant to make. And though we utter every word in its place, if we mean to make wrong impression, we can scarcely fail to do it; and we are falsifiers.

If this rule be not observed, there will be no safety in speech. If I speak jocosely, it can be reported in exact words but with a meaning opposite to that which I mean to convey. Earnestness may be turned into jest, kindness by the tone of the reporter, may be turned into bitterness, a compliment into sarcasm, and sarcasm into slander.

The worst malicious lies are those which are true in terms, and poison in intent—poison in honey, sweet and deadly; poison in fruits, hid and made tempting and sure. All hate the countenance of a lie; but when the face of truth carries the tongue of falsehood, many are deceived by it. Of all others, this mode of lying is the deadliest, the guiltiest—a dove with a viper's tongue; a lamb with a wolf's maw and heart; a devil, wearing the garb of the angel of light. And yet, if I mistake not, this is the most common form of malicious falsehood—a prudent use of the truth for the purposes of detraction.

I dwell upon this point longer, and with more emphasis, because I think lies of this class to be more generally practiced than any other form of malicious lie. Notoriously vile men will of course tell gross falsehoods, but they are suspected even when telling the truth; and they are soon exposed, and seldom trusted. But cautious men who are respectable, will never venture upon overt and dangerous methods. Such methods bear their wickedness too openly upon their face. A way is sought, therefore, in which conscience can be quieted; and to this end they speak the truth, but speak it so that their hearers will infer more or less than the truth. In this way they excuse themselves; and if a report which has, perhaps, disturbed the community, be traced back to them, they are able to say: "I spoke the exact truth. The man may have misunderstood me, but that was his fault, not mine. I spoke accurately, and if he did not hear accurately that was his lookout." All the time they know they used the words of truth in such a way as to convey a false impression. Falsehood, deception, artifice, whence come they? who is their father? and whither do they tend? Who will wield the pen, or raise the voice to recommend truth—"heaven-descended truth?" Truth, one of the attributes of the Deity—truth, one of the essential elements of the bliss and glory of Heaven! Truth, alas! is fallen in the streets, and no one comes to her rescue. Truth is beautiful. I gaze upon her fair lineaments and my feelings kindle into rapture. I grieve when she is dishonored, even as the fond lover grieves to see the idol of his affections wronged and degraded. Truth and falsehood are the substrata which underlie the whole moral structure of society. Every virtue is based upon truth, every vice has falsehood for its resting place. So true is this that a child trained to hate and fear a lie has a safeguard of moral character—a redeeming principle that will bring him back should he enter upon any devious way. Those who habitually practice falsehood in any of its forms, deceive themselves more than they deceive others. They lose the ability to discern the true or detect the false. They labor to cast a mist before the eyes of others, and are thus, at length, most miserably befogged themselves. Let us aim to cultivate Truth's trait of character, and we will add much to our worth in whatever department of life's varied scene we may chance to mingle. A man cannot long prosper, or what is of more importance, secure the respect or love of his fellows without integrity. It is the basis of credit—the security to which the world will look in its dealings with individuals, and open the account accordingly. A thousand devices are needed by the artful man to cloak his designs or hide his failures, of which the honest, upright man knows nothing. It is on the principal that many falsehoods are necessary to prop a single untruth, that it may not fall. The man of integrity stands up in the proud consciousness of his own moral worth; he heeds not the darts of malice—the breath of slander cannot harm him; his word has the efficiency of a bond.

STICK TO IT.

Stick to It. Yes, that's the doctrine, and a noble, God-like one it is, too. What great common sense, what philosophy—we had almost said sublimity—in these few words, Stick to It. Ah, that's the teaching. That came from a brave throat, and from a sound mind.

Young man, if you would succeed in anything, you must stick to it. There is nothing else that will bear you on. Never mind, though clouds lower, and prospects grow blue—and every avenue seems shut against you—have a brave heart, a strong zeal, and indomitable will—in other words stick to it, and you will ride the storm and direct the whirlwind. Ill tides beset every man. The sun shines on none all the time. We have known men to be down in the ditch scores of times, yet they worked out, got a new foothold, struggled on, and at last met their highest ambition. The fact was, they were stern, rugged, manly souls, and they would stick to it. And they rose, brave, beautifully triumphant.

How contemptible, puny and debasing is your changing man. In this thing to-day, in that thing to-morrow, and in another the next day. His life is a perfect blank. He does nothing—he amounts to nothing—and, what is still worse, will never be in his present course. No man can ever prosper unless he sticks to something. And yet how many there are all around us who jump and tumble from one thing to another, and still learn not the least wisdom thereby. The plainest teaching is unseen or at least unheeded, and the unfortunate man is ever in trouble, ruin and distress. Let "Stick to It" be your motto, and you may reach the clouds.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Nat Goodwin is preparing for his Fall theatrical campaign.

Between 1828 and 1889 Les Huguenots has been sung at the Paris opera house 812 times, Guillaume Tell 743 times, Robert de Diabie 718 times, La Favorita 601 times, and Faust 507 times. Faust, which was first given in 1859, has had, however, a larger yearly average of representations than any other work, Aida and L'Africaine following hard upon Gounod's masterpiece, and Les Huguenots and Tell coming next.

At a provincial theater, where Fanny Davenport was playing a tragic part, a very drunken man staggered down the aisle to the orchestra. He watched the actress attentively, so much so that she caught his eye several times, and as she pronounced these words: "I can love you no longer," the man rose, put on his hat, bowed profoundly to Miss Davenport, said with much drunken gravity: "That settles it," and left the theater.

Professor Hermann paid a local manager in a suburban town $500 to cancel one night, in order that he might be present at the opening of his new theatre in New York on Saturday evening, October 4th. When the clever prestidigitateur arrived in the metropolis he found his playhouse still in the hands of the workmen and a week behind proper condition for opening. Moral: There is more certainty in the Vanishing Lady than painters and decorators.

It is not generally known that Bishop, the mind reader, when a boy, was much in the household of old Commodore Vanderbilt, and that the boy and the Commodore were chums after a fashion. At that early day the boy possessed the odd faculty that afterward made him famous, and it was a favorite trick of the Commodore's to place a hand on the boy's head and demand the price of some railway stock. As often as not young Bishop gave a correct answer, and the old financier was deeply puzzled by the fact.

When McVicker's Theater opened, after the big fire, August 15, 1872, the following poem, written by Mr. William Young, author of "Pendragon" and "Ganelon," was read by Manager J. H. McVicker, as an epilogue to the play:

As one who gathering in his harvest-home,
Invites the faithful sharers of his toil
To taste the first fruit of his wine, and oil,
But finds his heart fail when his guests have come,

And so keeps modest silence in his seat,
Till seeing only smiles on every face,
He slowly gathers courage, and takes grace
To say his benediction after meat:

So we, since now the crumbs have been swept up,
—The fare discussed—the critic laughed his laugh,
May surely offer on the host's behalf
The good-night greeting, and the stirring cup.

Was it a dream? It seems but yester-night
We heard the croaking raven flying high,
A dismal voice against a flame-lit sky,
And Hate and Fear flew with him in his flight.

"Caw! Caw!" the chorus shrieked, "The end of all
Has come! Unharm'd the owl shall build her nest
In crannies open to the screaming West,
And o'er the sculptured stone the lizard crawl!"

The many pass; The chosen few abide.
Silence, the vain complaint!—the idle boast!
A brimming cup! Here is the Chairman's toast:
A double health to you, O true and tried!

The castle of the Norway Sigurd grew
Out of the gray sea vapor, fold on fold,
Lured by the ditty of a witch of old—
A greater marvel was reserved for you.

You sang beside your ruined altars—sang
Beside your black hearths—a song of cheer!
All hand in hand you sang; you laughed at fear;
Across the listening world your voices rang.

A breath!—a stir!—a change! and lo! again
Behold the lifting dome! the pointing spire!
The buried city climbing heavenward, higher,
To its old seat among the thrones of men!

What days were ours! what days of toil and sun!
How much may happen in a little year!
Strange! and to think when last we gossiped here,
What kingdoms have been lost! what kingdoms won!

Friends!—for the fellow toilers should be friends—
What need to bid you welcome to your own?
Strong was the hand that fitted stone to stone—
Strong was the will that shaped the builder's ends—

But stronger yet is fellowship! and strong
To cheer the steadfast hearts! and some fair day
The pilgrim at your finished shrine shall say
"Behold the city builded by a song!"

Well! well!—The feast is done. Put out the lights!
The carriages are waiting at the door.
Whatever is accomplished, something more
Remains to do; but every gain requites.

Remember, if the harvest be but small,
'Twas reaped and garnered from a wasted land,
And so, before we part, let's stretch a hand
Across the board, and say: "God bless us all."

A ballot of sixty-nine, led by the famous De Gellert, a cast proper of fifty, a singing chorus of 100, a mob of 300, a Roman pageant of 400, displaying all the ancient handicrafts, preceded by a band of Roman instruments and followed by a procession of caged wild beasts, will give an idea of the magnitude of the new spectacular drama, Nero, which Messrs. Lock and Davis are projecting and will produce at Niblo's on the 20th of this month. The S. S. France, which sailed for this port on the 29th ult., has on board six lions which are to be introduced cageless in the arena scene.

It would be difficult to find elsewhere in the world a more remarkable figure than William J. Florence. No one ever dares to hint at that genial comedian's age, but there is no doubt that he is beyond the fifties, and he may be considerably on towards the other mark. Yet he has the vigor of youth, and his attire is invariably indicative of a young man of taste and fashion. No one ever hears him complain for an instant of any of the ills which flesh is heir to. His eye is clear as a boy's. Mr. Florence owes a great deal of his health, according to his story, to his exercise and early rising. He is an indefatigable walker, and he seldom sleeps more than six hours out of the twenty-four.

There are over three thousand engaged actors in New York at the present time. Why? New York has 28 theatres; the gross seating capacity of which is over 50,000 people. There are hundreds of concert, music and lecture halls all over the city; two-thirds of which are used every night. It is safe to estimate the total capacity of the various places of amusement in the metropolis at 150,000. Over 75,000 dollars are spent every night in the big city for theatrical and musical entertainments. The new Madison Square Garden is the largest place of amusement; next comes the Academy, where The Old Homestead is a permanent attraction, then the Metropolitan Opera House, and Niblo's, where the great spectacular production of Nero is to occur October 20th.

Messrs. Gilmore and Comstock, of the Academy, New York, have been fairly deluged with farce comedies since the announcement that they intended to star Barney Fagan and Bob Slavin in a play of that character next season. The contributions have come from every section of the country, ranging from the back woods of Michigan to the swamps of Florida. So burdensome became the duty of receiving and perusing them that the services of every employe in the house, from the treasurer to the man at the back door, were enlisted in the great task. The striking adaptability of the scenario furnished by Clay E. Greene, coupled with the fame of that writer and the peculiar suitability of the roles suggested, decided the managers in favor of A High Roller, the contracts for the scenery of which have already been awarded.

Book Chat.

While yet the world was young the gods on high
Bestowed the gift of wine upon the earth;
The wide world rang with jocund minstrelsy,
And laughter, shouting, ushered in the birth.
The boon was suited to the youth of man;
But as the weight of years upon him grew,
And wise and sorrowful old age began,
The gods consulted and devised anew.
Then was revealed the solace that should bless;
Gray-bearded Contemplation wore a smile;
Grief raised her hands in trembling thankfulness,
And all confessed they now might bear awhile.
Said Zeus: "Love, wine and learning, 'tis but three;
The race is dying—let tobacco be."

The poet wears the bay, and the humorist, if he sports any kind of a horse, confines his attention to the chestnut.

The Swiss authorities deny that they have ordered the William Tell episode to be expunged from the school books. They believe that their national hero really existed, and that the assertion that he is a myth is not well founded.

Poet (picking a primrose in the spring)—"I am very glad, at last, to see this lovely flower. This is the one then that I have written so many poems to!"

Many of the best things said by Douglas Jerrold and Sidney Smith were borrowed from the Latin, and some of Coleridge's finest epigrams are mere translations from the Greek. Probably the most celebrated of them is that one which records the devil's dealings with Job:

To try Job's constancy and patience
He took his honors, took his health;
He took his children, took his wealth,
His camels, horses, asses, cows,
Still the sly devil did not take his spouse.

But Heaven, that brings out good from evil,
And loves to disappoint the devil,
Had predetermined to restore
Two-fold of all Job had before --
His children, camels, asses, cows --
Short-sighted devil not to take his spouse.

Olive Thorne Miller, in Epoch: I like a good novel; who does not? And it is always my remedy for depression of spirits, but I read few nowadays. I consider them, on the whole, the most useful of books; having powerful therapeutic qualities, hardly suspected at present. I think it is not unlikely that we shall yet see the day when physicians shall order them. I wish all the world of nurses knew the value of novels in a sick room. To put it in Carlyle's strong words: "Those poor bits of rag paper, with black ink on them—from the daily newspaper to the sacred Hebrew book, what have they not done; what are they not doing?" I can hardly name my favorites, for my selection depends upon the object I have in view in reading one. To put myself in a writing mood I read "Jane Eyre;" to take leave completely of myself and my environment, when either of us become unbearable, my recipe (and I can recommend it) is a novel of Wilkie Collins. "The Woman in White" kept me out of bed for nearly two nights. To be amused and pass away a dull half-hour I go to Dickens and spend it with the two Wellers, Mrs. Gamp and Betsey Prig, Betsey Trotwood and Miss Murdock or Mrs. Peerybingle. To bring down too high spirits, to take all the sentiment and beauty, not to say common decency, out of life—if ever I needed such a book—I turn to Balzac, de Maupassant or some other French or Russian novelist, or to Schopenhauer or one of the bat-blind materialists of our day. "Why do women prefer reading novels to the news of the day?" The answer is patent; they must have relief from the monotony or the misery of their lives. Montaigne gives the prescription, "To divert myself from a troublesome fancy, 'tis but to run to my books."

"I do not know," Gautier said one day to M. Bergerat, "what posterity may think of me, but it does seem to me that I have at least done something for my country's language. When I am dead it would be ungrateful to refuse me the title of a philologist. Ah, my dear boy!" he went on smilingly, "if only we had as many piastres or roubles as I have won back words from Malherbe and his crew! You young fellows will be grateful to me one day when you find out what an instrument I have left ready for your hands, and you will defend my memory against the diplomats of letters who, because they have no ideas to express and no wits to express them with, would restrict us to the hundred words that made up Racine's vocabulary. Note this: When I am recognized as a classic, thought in France will have come near to liberty!" "You think, then," said M. Bergerat, "it has not attained liberty now?" "No," replied Gautier; "it is no more at ease than a person whose clothes are too tight, or who has no clothes at all, so that he cannot go out into the street. It is a choice between suffocation and freezing. When thought has found words to fit it, then it begins its march; and if these words are beautiful in form and color it takes on courage and triumph; for thus handsomely attired it is welcomed by the great ones of the earth. And if a poet adorns its feet with the two music-making wings of his rhyme, then thought flies and soars!" [Light-minded stuff this, according to our latest instructor, and with no more intent of purpose or happiness of expression than what follows.] "The so-called classical taste," he continued, "led straight to the style of a telegram or a bulletin. Victor Hugo, in 1836, put the drag on this headlon; descent. His strong hand discovered and met the strong hand of Rensard in the shade of the ages, and he leaped two centuries of Boileautism to renew the fruitful traditions of the Renaissance. My part," he went on, "in this literary revolution was clearly defined. I was painter to the company. I sallied forth to the conquest of adjectives, and I unearthed some whose charm and beauty have now become a necessity of life. I rummaged through the sixteenth century, to the horror of the regular subscribers to the Theatre Francais and of many worthy folk. I came back with my basket full of rockets and catherine-wheels. I made up the palette of style with all the tones of the daybreak and the sunset. I gave you back red, which had been disgraced by the politicians."

Professional Chat.

A minister in Lancaster, Pa., preached the other day while he slept. He must have been hypnotized by his congregation, that slept while he preached.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker declares in favor of the postal telegraph. He would make the use of the telegraph cheaper, and bring it within the reach of all the people. There would seem to be as much propriety in the government sending messages for the people by electricity as by steam, by wire as by rail.

Business Man(to applicant for position)—"Your references as to character are very good, sir, and although you have had no experience I will try you." Applicant—"Thank you. I forgot to tell you I had a college education." Business man—"Well, don't worry about that. You will soon forget it."

Colonel Dow, son of General Neal Dow, the originator of the Maine Law, has just taken the Portland Collectorship. In this, it is suggested, he takes the place of his distinguished father, who never takes anything.

Scripture subjects suggest an anecdote that is told of an American clergyman, who, in one of his sermons, severely criticized the Swedenborgian heaven, its green fields, fine horses and cattle, and beautiful women. In the midst of his glowing harangue one of the sisters went into raptures and shouted: "Glory! glory! glory!" This so disconcerted the preacher that he stopped short in his address, when an elder called out to the enraptured female: "Hold on there, sister! You're shouting over the wrong heaven!"

When Sam Jones was preaching in a Western town some time ago, he was annoyed by a young man who was whispering to his girl. Finally the preacher could stand the interruption no longer, so he looked straight at the young man, and said: "I will pause until the young man in the back of the room gets through talking." The silence was intense and every eye was on the young man, who was still whispering to his girl. He had been so busy that he had not caught the preacher's censure. Mr. Jones repeated his remark and this time the young man heard him. Not an instant did he hesitate, but he immediately tried to square himself. While everyone was watching him, he looked squarely at the preacher and said: "Go right ahead, Mr. Jones, you are not bothering me."

The Fremont, (Neb.) Tribune tells a good story about a local minister who recently preached at a camp meeting. After the sermon the customary invitation was given for all who wanted to go to Heaven to rise up. All present rose to their feet except one young man, who sat back pretty well on the outskirts of the audience. Those who desired to go to Heaven sat down. Then all those who wanted to go to hell were requested to rise to their feet, and the aforesaid young man was eyed with a good deal of interest. Still he sat as quiet and composed as a stone. The minister went to him and asked him why he did not rise in either instance. "Well," replied the husky son of toil, "I don't want to go anywhar. Fremont's good enough for me." And the preacher wended his way back to the altar, and sitting down on the mourners' bench, leaned over and tied his shoe.

A home in the Greeley family, says the Chicago Herald, was one of the stipulations when Margaret Fuller entered on the work of the New York Tribune. Margaret did not enjoy the bare walls, the vegetable diet, the healthy cold water which were the luxuries of her host, and no amount of persuasion on his part could make her see any necessary connection between brain and brain. Even when they agreed on important matters they were sure to differ in details. Margaret demanded for women the fullest recognition of social and political equality with men. Greeley admitted this, but insisted that the equalizing theory can be enforced only by ignoring the habitually discrimination of men and women, as forming separate classes, and regarding all alike as persons—as human beings. Greeley said: "So long as a lady shall deem herself in need of some gentleman's arm to conduct her properly out of the dining or ball room; so long as she shall consider it dangerous or unbecoming to walk half a mile alone by night, I cannot see how the woman's rights theory is ever to be anything more than an abstraction." Margaret, however, could not assent to this, for instinctively she exacted from men a deference and courtesy which was inconsistent with the views of her opponent.

A prominent surgeon at a recent banquet told the following story on a well-known young physician who was present. Calling the attention of all present to the young man, he said: "I have a good joke on John. He had a very bad case of pneumonia which he had treated very well. His patient pulled along very well, and was finally nearly well. John told him so, but said that in three days he would call again to see if anything further was needed. In three days he called. His patient's brother met him at the door with a long face, and said, 'I have sad news for you, doctor; brother is dead.' John stood there for a minute, and thought, 'Well, how am I going to get out of this. I have got to let myself down easy.' He began to run over in his mind all the cause that might produce a sudden death, and finally decided on one that he thought would do. He said, 'Such things happen now and then. Sometime one cause and sometimes another brings it on. Now, I expect that with your brother, a clot of blood suddenly formed in the heart, and killed him.' He rattled this off and kept talking for several minutes without giving his listener time to say a word. He stood with his mouth open and gazed at the doctor as he fired technical terms at him. Finally, as John stopped to take a breath, he said in a most serious tone, 'No, doctor, that ain't what killed brother. He went down to the canal and fell in and was drowned.' John did not say a word, but left as the 'horse was on him,' and has never had the heart to send in his bill."

NOTES.

Never judge a man's income, by his clothes. It is a much safer guide to wait until you can see his wife's clothes.

Work has commenced on the Nicaragua canal. There are three thousand men at work. This looks something like a consummation of the great scheme.

Voters should bear in mind that registration closes at the County Clerk's office today. There has been plenty of notice given, and if any one neglects to be enrolled it will be his own fault.

"On, Stanley, on!" will be the war cry of the Democrats and Mapwumps in this county. Stanley will, however, have to get a lively move on to keep up with McMullen's procession.

Democratic statesmen are getting out of the range of Republican guns. The ordinance of the former is loaded only with light projectiles of paper war order, while the latter carry chain shot and canister.

Politicians lie for the real pleasure there is in it. Lawyers on the contrary lie only when there is a profit to be realized. But when we have the politician and lawyer combined into one, how is it?

Pulitzer, who built up the New York World, and who has always been its chief editor and director of the policy of the paper, has been compelled to withdraw as editor, on account of failing health. The management of the World will be placed in the hands of an Executive Board, composed of its principal editors.

Herr Most, the blatant anarchist, it is said intends to leave America. Most people will be pleased at this resolve. America can get along without such cattle. If he could only find it convenient to go to Hades or some other undiscovered country the world would be benefited.

Smoking is so common in Japan that all of the men and most of the women smoke, the girls begin when they are about ten years of age. The ladies have pipes with longer stems than the men, and if one of them wishes to show a gentleman a special mark of favor, she lights her pipe, takes a whiff, hands it to him and lets him smoke.

The ancients placed immense value on their gems. The pearl given to Servilla by Julius Caesar, was valued at $24,000; the gems on the scabbard of the sword of Mithridates were valued at $37,800; the value of the pearl swallowed by Cleopatra was worth $25,000; the pearls worn by Lollia Paulina, wife of Calligula, were valued at $4,600,000.

Experiments have recently been made in Spain on the action of sunlight in maturing wines. Layers of new wines in bottles of colored glass have been exposed to the direct rays of the sun, with the result that both flavor and quality have been improved. In the south of Europe there has been a practice of ripening cognac by exposing the bottles on the roof for years.

Rev. David Swing is quoted as saying that he will be "glad of the dawn of the day when every minister has a smooth face." This seems to be in favor of the time when it will not be considered necessary for the youthful preachers to tarry at Jericho until their beards are grown. Preachers are pretty generally a very smooth article otherwise. With smooth faces many would be the perfection of smoothness.

The prudish Aldermen of Boston have revoked the license of the Park Theater, because a young woman appears in tights and a Jersey. It seems that the "correct" people of the alleged modern Athens, take offense at Sybil Johnstone, who dons flesh tights in the play Clemenceau Case. Well, Boston is a very "correct" city, and with her "culture" and "beans" could not be expected to countenance the presentation of the human form in tights. Ugly mugs with glasses, are better suited to the "culture" of Boston.

The survivors of the famous Stevenson's regiment, which was in service in California during the Mexican War, will have their annual re-union and dinner in New York, October 24th, in commemoration of the forty-second anniversary of the discharge of the regiment. In January next the Society will issue a revised "Roll of the Survivors" of the regiment containing a report of the deaths recorded during the past three years. We are indebted to Francis D. Clark, President of the Survivors of the First Regiment of New York Volunteers, commanded by Jonathan D. Stevenson, for a notice of the above re-union. Forty-two years since this regiment was mustered out of service! This is a long space in a human life. The rauks of this noted body of men must necessarily be rapidly thinning out. There are indeed "Only a few of them left."

The Women's Temperance Union of Iowa, divided on political party questions, which refutes the long contended proposition of the advocates, that there was nothing partisan in their councils. Those people who are adjuncts to the Prohibitionists now can be brought to realize that their work tends always to Democratic successes.

It appears now, from an investigation by Secretary Blaine, that all the alleged persecutions of the Jews by the Russian Government living in that country are entirely baseless. The Hebrews there confirm this belief. It certainly is not in accord with the advanced ideas of civilization that these reports could be true, and that the outrages alleged could have occurred.

The Union League Club will give a reception to Senator Stanford and members of the California Congressional delegation at its Club House, San Francisco, this evening. A large number of distinguished citizens have been invited to attend this reception. The sentiments expressed on this occasion are likely to be of a character that will indicate the true policy of the National Republican Party.

The citizens of Oakland gave Hon. Jos. McKenna a rousing reception on Wednesday night. His speech was a splendid effort, and wherein he rendered an account of his stewardship. He reviewed the leading issues and exploded the stupid fallacies of the Democratic opposition to the tariff and other important measures of Congress. The Oakland people are pleased with his work and will return him with increased majorities.

Our local Democrats seem to be very unfortunate in the matter of procuring candidates to go on their ticket, and to fill up have been compelled to go into the camp of the enemy. The Republicans have been liberal with them and doubtless will be generous enough to permit their opponents to endorse their entire ticket that they will not suffer the humiliating defeat that awaits them in November.

The statistics of suicide among school children in Prussia during the six years from 1883 to 1888, inclusive, show that during that period 289 children took their own lives. Of this number 240 were boys and 49 girls. In 29.8 per cent. of the cases no cause could be assigned; but as regards the others, fear of punishment or of the examinations, excessive ambition and insanity were found to be the inciting reasons. These figures are amazing and seem hardly credible, yet an epidemic of suicide has been general of late years throughout Germany.

The great increase shown by the police census of New York City, over the Federal census, does not establish anything certain. There were no precautions taken by the police census takers against repeated enumerations. Besides this there was a decided disposition to enlarge the returns by the authorities of New York for political ends. When we consider the manner in which New York City is governed, and what the dominant party therein desires, it is not at all astonishing that there should be a great increase by this unreliable census system adopted by the local authorities. The way for this great increase was prepared by the leading Democratic papers, in order that that there might be additional members of Congress from that city. However, this enumeration cannot be considered by the Federal authorities, unless there is some action by them to adopt the same.

There are loud and ominous threats from the Solid South, that the twelve members of Congress from that section will be prevented from being returned to Congress at the next session, and their places filled by those who are true to the ideas of this misguided section. This is determined upon as an absolute fiat, through that Jesuitical doctrine, "The Ends Justify the Means." With the consummation of this scheme, the next Congress would likely be Democratic. Should there be foundation for this conspiracy, then would an extra session of Congress, and the passage of the Lodge Federal Election Bill, become a necessity to protect the ballot and give a fair expression at the polls. It is probable that the Cabinet is fully advised of this plan to capture the majority of the next Congress, and therefore is considering formally the idea of an extra session next month.

A writer in the Westminster Review has the correct idea as to how to give proper expression to thought. He urges that writing is the helper and creator of thought; let any one try the experiment of thinking out a given subject, mentally only, for half an hour; and then perform the same operation on another day, with the aid of a pen, and he will get not only a clearer view of thought, but very many more ideas by the process; thoughts through writing flow more freely. A thought formulated, defined in the mind, once discharged, and fixed on paper, leaves a vacuum in the mind for the generation of still further thoughts; we have no more trouble with it; so ideas will follow in orderly succession. Further, the fixture of a thought on paper has another effect—it passes from the paper through the eye into the mental laboratory, and so in itself becomes suggestive of other ideas, for in the psychology of our nature the senses contribute much to the process of thought. Writing, then, makes not only an exact, but a thinking man.

A high hat suggests leisure, elegance and a certain measure of wealth. Now, you know I have but little leisure, cannot claim to be elegant, and am far from wealthy. Again, nicely polished shoes, fashionably cut clothes and a clean shave should at all times be the accompaniments to a tall tile. In other words, the man who wears a shiny beaver should never be indifferent to appearances. He should keep his shoes well polished, never neglect being shaved and should be faultlessly attired. There are days when, in regard to these particulars, I am, perhaps, a Beau Brummel, but ordinarily I am a trifle off in some particulars. My shoes are frequently in need of an artist in black and the barber and I are at times strangers for several days. And then I hustle so much in quest of news and all that sort of thing that I cannot always don my best attire. I cannot, in short, keep up the correct front for a tall hat. I like the dressy head piece, and they tell me it becomes me, but, as I have said, I avoid its use. And now you know why. Yes, if I make a hit and feel at liberty to devote fifteen in twenty-four hours to anything but hard work I'll don a silk tile.

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

Women wear flowers sometimes because they are vain, not because they love them. Flowers are alive and it kills them to lay near the heart that has no love for them. They droop and mourn themselves to death, because they know there is nothing in common between them and the wearer. They are like little children—they love those who love them, and their best, brightest beauty is given to the woman who pins the bouquet on through her love for the flowers. A physician said: "Certainly some women can kill flowers within a very few minutes. It is a sure indication that a poisonous vapor is escaping from the body to a great degree. It may be the result of disease or it may be that bathing and proper care of the skin are neglected."

Not long ago, says the Atlanta Constitution, an old negro man stood leaning over the rail in Grant Park menagerie and looked long and earnestly at the elephant. Finally he turned to keeper Havens and said: "Boss, where does dey come from?" "From Africa, where you came from." "Is dey wild, or kin you ketch 'em easy?" "No trouble at all. People go out and catch an elephant every day if they want to." "Is dey good to eat?" "Oh, yes; people over there eat them the same as we eat beef." "Golly, how I wish I had one er dem hams! It ud las' me er year."

Maine puts in a claim for the shortest courtship on record, and the claim is worth considering. Deacon Marvin one day mounted his horse with only a sheepskin for a saddle, and riding in front of the house where Betty Lee lived called to her to come out to the gate. She made her appearance, and without any preliminaries he told her that the Lord had sent him there to marry her. Betty, with a courtesy, replied: "The Lord's will be done." And so it was.

A quick and easy method of determining whether or not a fabric is "all wool" is given in the London Lancet. This is to separate the warp from the woof and to hold each to a flame. Wool burns into a shapeless mass and no threads can be traced in the ash. If removed from the fire before it is all burned it ceases to blaze; cotton, on the contrary, continues to burn steadily, and its ash retains the shape of the thread.

Rare Baseball Contest.

This afternoon two baseball clubs formed from the young and charitably disposed gentlemen of this city, will play a match game of ball at Snowflake Park, the proceeds to be devoted to the Kindergarten School. Rare sport is anticipated for the audience. It may be a left-handed kind of fun for the contesting clubs, but the game will be for the local championship. Considering the fun in store, and the charitable object, a large crowd should be there to witness the gladiatorial contest.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Last night the Metropolitan was well filled to witness the great pantomime, variety and athletic performance of the Hanton-Votter-Martinetti Troupe. There was no disappointment in the company. It can well be said that this is a combination of stars in their respective lines. To night the company will repeat the splendid performance. Manager Hall intends during the winter season to furnish our amusement loving public a great number of the principal attractions on the stage.

On Monday evening next Thos. W. Keene will commence an engagement in Shakespearean drama. Mr. Keene now stands as one of the leading actors of the age, one of the few Shakespearean artists now on the mimic stage. Within the last few years he has made some rapid advancements in the divine art. On Monday night that magnificent creation of Bulwer, Richetieu will be given. Tuesday Shylock, Wednesday Richard III. We have not seen Keene for several years, but learn from reading criticisms of his work by the best critics in the world, that he is truly great in his rendition Richetieu, Shylock and Richard III. It is said that the support is good. We hope so, because in these plays there must be support.

As can be seen elsewhere in our columns, the famous New United Shows, an aggregation of world-wide celebrity, will visit Sacramento on October 22d, 23d and 24th. It is said the whole show, from first to last, is of unusual excellence. The horses are splendid specimens, while the artists are culled from the very best on every continent; that, together with its new features never before seen with other shows cannot fail to interest. It is vouched for that the above combination exhibits the largest known animal, Queen Jumbo, whose history is identified with the Zoological Gardens, London, and is recognized as the undoubted mastodon of mastodons. That there is a treat in store for us and an occasion of recreative amusement no one can deny. It is not often that such an opportunity presents itself. We will all be there to see it.

Hereafter a commercial lunch will be served at the Café Royal, corner of 7th and J streets. This will be welcomed by the business men as the lunch will be first class in every respect, and at popular price. *

Stevenson Regiment.

We have received the follow communication from Francis D. Clark of New York, the Secretary of the Survivors of the First Regiment of New York (Colonel J. D. Stevenson, Commander):

The annual re-union and dinner of this society will be held at Morello's, No 4 West 29th street, on Friday evening, the 24th inst., at 7 o'clock. Forty-second anniversary of the discharge of the regiment in California.

Comrades who reside at too great a distance to permit of their attendance, are requested to communicate by mail; those intending to join us will please give timely notice.

In January, next, this society will issue a revised "Roll of the Survivors" of the regiment, also containing a report of all deaths recorded during the past three years, a copy of which will be mailed to every known surviving comrade. Any change in the address of a comrade should be promptly reported.

A Literary Conversation.

A charming debutante met a distinguished lawyer at a reception and was much flattered when he asked leave to call upon her the next evening. Bent on making herself agreeable she consulted with her girl friends respecting his likes and dislikes, his hobbies, etc. "Oh, I'm nearly scared to death," she confessed to one sympathetic maiden. "They say he's so awfully smart, and I'm certain I won't talk well enough to please him. Now, you've known him a long time. Do tell me what subjects to discuss so I can run home and get ready for him." "Well," suggested the kind-hearted friend, "literature is his fad, so you can't go wrong if you turn the conversation in that channel." Having secured this valuable information Miss Bud hurried home comforted, and devoted the rest of the day to reading. Promptly at 8 o'clock the young lawyer was ushered in the drawing room, where he found Miss Bud (thoroughly posted in literature) awaiting him. "Wasn't it a delightful reception we attended last evening?" he asked by way of opening the conversation. "Oh, yes," was the enthusiastic response, "but wasn't that sad about poor Mary Queen of Scots? They cut her head off, you know." I regret to state that neither history nor the young lawyer has recorded the rest of this very literary conversation.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A New Habeas Corpus.

One of the young lights of the Pittsburg bar was sitting in his office one day last week when a countryman, who was enjoying with a client's freedom the best chair and doing absolutely nothing, as only a farmer can in urban circumstances, broke the silence with: "Say, mister, been to court much?"

The young attorney looked over the top of the newspaper and answered ironically: "Once or twice in the Orphans' Court last week."

That suggested somehow or other divorces in the rural mind, and he said, meditatively: "I don't like it. No—o—o—it hain't good—so many married folks playin' quits that er way. Toby sure, some wimmin hain't content without everlastin' dressin' an' dressin'—then, again, men can't sometimes arn 'nough wags to keep ther wives right. A fellow hain't no biz marryin' without three thousand er so laid by an' makin' $50 er month."

"Just what I think myself," said the attorney.

"Yes, concluded the farmer, slapping a big palm on the blotter, "there's too many o'them ar habir corpses granted nowadays—that's er fact!"—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Mistress—Mercy on me, what a kitchen! Every pot, pan and dish is dirty, the table looks like a junk shop, and—why it will take you a week to get the things cleared up. What have you been doing?

Servant—Sure, mum, the young leddies have been down here showing me how they roast a potato at the cooking school.

An American tourist was visiting Naples, and saw Vesuvius during the eruption. "Have you anything like that in the New World?" was the question of an Italian spectator. "No," replied Jonathan, "but I guess we have a milldam that would put it out in five minutes."

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY
of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of R. S. McClure, an insolvent debtor.

R. S. McCLURE having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said R. S. McClure is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said R. S. McClure, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate.
All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent, to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use. And the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. John W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 31st day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, P. M. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated Sept. 25, 1890.
JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.

A Tiger Swallows a Red-Hot Bolt.

A curious tale of the death of a tiger comes from the Southall Pergumans. A man was seated on a tree at night watching his fields, when he noticed a tiger prowling and sniffing the air and gradually approaching his perch, until it actually came under the machan, which it tried to pull down. The Southall, bold by nature, sat fearlessly looking on, considering all the while as to what he should do.

Quick as thought he took a red hot iron, and as the hungry man eater with open mouth leaped to catch his hanging leg, he dropped the bolt into his mouth and the tiger at once swallowed it, with what result it is needless to say, except that the beast was found not far off the next morning "stark and stiff." The only question is: "Where did the red hot iron come from?" No doubt from the next village, which is about three miles off.

Max Muller has shown that hundreds of words of as many different meanings have descended from one root; and so it is with jokes. If all the traditional links could be supplied, we might trace many a score of them to some old Yorick who shook his jolly sides at the builders of the Pyramids. Many of the most amusing extravagances in "Baron Munchausen" are borrowed literally from the old Latin jest books. The wild pig which led about by its tail a blind wild boar, so that when the former was slain the latter was lured into captivity by simply giving it the tail to hold, is older than the Crasades. And so the Scotchman who, rising from an humble position to be a Mayor, assured his "necibors that he was still a mon," had a Dutch grandmother. The old story is that "when a certain man had been made the Prefect of a small village, he bought his wife a rich fur garment. She, proud of her finery and vain of her husband's new honors, entered church just as the congregation was rising to hear the Psalter read, and, thinking this was being done out of respect to her, said graciously: "Sit down, good people! I have not forgotten I was once poor."

Of equal antiquity is the story of the two Irishmen crossing a stream, one upon the back of the other, and the second one carrying a keg of whiskey. "Sure, Paddy," said the latter, "if ye carry me, don't I carry the whiskey, and isn't that fair and aigh?" It is slightly different in the older story where a certain Piero, pitting his weary mule which bore a heavy plow, took the plow upon his shoulder, and mounting the mule, said to it: "Now, you may go along, Bobbin, for not you, but I, bear the plow."

There are ten commandments hung on the walls of the Hindu Theological College in Madras. Thou shalt reproduce them: (1) Pray to God as soon as you rise from your bed—5:10 A. M. (2) Wash your body and keep your surroundings clean—5:10-5:30 A. M. (3) Prostrate yourselves before your parents or guardians, and take good exercise 5:30 to 6:30 A. M. (4) Prepare well your school lesson—6:30-9 A. M. (5) Attend school regularly and punctually, and do the school works properly. (6) Obey and respect your teacher, and the teachers of the other classes, and other respectable persons. (7) Read till 8 P. M. at home. (8) Pray to God and go to bed—9 P. M. to 5 A. M. (9) Keep good company and avoid bad company. (10) Practice righteousness at all times.

Two colored brethren were holding a little religious convention between themselves. Said Elder Jefferson: "Now Bruder Jones, just what am your besetting sin?" "Well, elder, if I must confess, I reckon my 'settin sin am lub for de female sect." "Ah, ah, ah!" "What for you larf so Masser Jefferson?" "Well just dis, Bruder Jones; same dog bit me." "Is dat so?" "Yas, for shun." They shook hands and the convention adjourned.

Champagne (the wine) was discovered by a monk—one Dom Perignon. This holy person was the inventor of corks. One day, handling a bottle of wine which he himself had corked tightly, the bottle exploded. Unwilling to lose the precious fluid, the pious monk scooped up the wine in his hands, and, ah! how delicious it was! It filled Dom Perignon's head with all sorts of blissful fancies, it set the good old man to thinking, and the result of it all was—champagne!

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M. RICHARD, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do herewith set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July A. D. 1890.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. D. Bennett, an Insolvent Debtor

J. D. Bennett having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. D. Bennett is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal, of the said J. D. Bennett, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 17th day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed. Dated, Sept. 15th 1890.

The Holyoke Transcript says to 1-known citizens were standing together in the corridor of the postoffice. One happened to notice that a postal card held in the fingers of the other was directed to the holder. "Why, how does this come?" was asked; "do you write letters to yourself?" "In this case, yes," was the answer. "That's funny." "Well, not so very. See the other side." He held it up, and the other side read:

"Bro. Blank: There will be a meeting of the I. O. O. S. B., No. 587, at the hall, the evening of June 20, to transact special business. Members not present will be fined $15. J. B. —, Secretary."

"Yes, but I don't exactly catch on," protested the innocent. "O, you don't! Well, I got the cards printed myself. The society is all a myth. When I want to go out of an evening, I direct one of these postals to my house. When I reach home my wife hands it to me with a sigh. I offer to stay at home and stand the fine of $15, but she won't have it that way. That's all, my friend, except that the scheme is worked by hundreds of others, and our poor, deluded wives haven't tumbled to the racket yet." It is too bad to give this away, but it is too good to keep.

Divorce is not common in China. The law recognizes seven grounds for the divorce of a wife—namely, loquacity, malignant disease, neglect of husband's parents, childlessness, thievishness, adultery, wanton conduct, and jealousy. In China the avowed end of matrimony is to raise up a posterity to burn incense at the ancestral graves; therefore it is not surprising that childlessness should be regarded almost as a crime. To secure a divorce under ordinary circumstances is no easy thing. The family of the wife combat it with great energy, for the reason that, no provision having been made for her support by them after her marriage, they are unwilling that she should be thrown back upon them for a living. When the daughters are married off a certain portion of land is set aside for the parents and the rest is divided among the sons. No part is given to a daughter. Therefore must every girl wed or go to the dogs. It is common for the husband to agree to provide for the maintenance of the woman he divorces; in fact, this is the only way a separation can be secured without a bitter fight, except in cases where unfaithfulness is provable.—Eugene Field.

An old bachelor says that giving the ballot to woman would not amount to anything practically, because they would keep denying they were old enough to vote until they got to be too old to take any interest in politics.

JEWELS AND LACES."Oh, girl with the jewelled fingers, Oh, girl with the laces rare!"

What are your jewels and what are your laces worth to you if, from undergoing the trying ordeals which fashionable society imposes on its devotees, enough to test the physical strength and endurance of the most robust, you break down, lose your health and become a physical wreck, as thousands do from such causes?

Under such circumstances you would willingly give all your jewels and all your laces to regain lost health. This you can do if you will but resort to the use of that great restorative known as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Thousands of grateful women bless the day it was made known to them.

For all derangements, irregularities and weaknesses peculiar to women, it is the only remedy, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

An invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system. For feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon.

Dr. Pierce's Pellets regulate and cleanse the liver, stomach and bowels. One a dose. Sold by druggists. 25 cents a vial.W. A. ANDERSON,

"Flirting the Gravel."

"When I was returning home upon a furlough during the latter part of the war," said Congressman Buck Kilgore of Texas, to a Washington Post reporter, "I pulled up at a little cabin on the roadside in Louisiana about night. The sole occupant of the cabin was one woman. She refused to let me remain during the night or to give me anything to eat. I had one gold dollar in my pocket which I offered to pay her for a chicken, which had just been cooked and was smoking on the table. She refused to sell the chicken at any price, but was willing to wager the chicken against the dollar that she could beat me jumping, I to make the first jump, starting from the log doorstep. I took a survey of the very short woman who had bantered me for a trial of my activity, and then surveyed myself. I was a long-legged cuss and I put the dollar on the table by the chicken. I then took a position on the doorstep, swung my hands to and fro, pluming for my flight through the air. Then I lit out for the tallest jump on record. By the time I hit the ground and turned to see the woman follow, she had shut the door and fastened it on the inside. The only thing I could see was the muzzle of a double-barrelled shot gun, supplemented by a firm female voice admonishing me to move out, and to move quickly. I moved. There was something about that voice and that gun which inspired me with the idea that it would be unhealthy for me to linger there longer.

"It was now dark, and going a half mile, I stopped for the night at a gin house, under which stood a grist mill no longer in use, I placed two or three planks on the top of the hopper, some seven or eight feet from the ground, and crawled up for a night's sleep. I had not been there long when I heard a peculiar whistle, not far away, which was responded to in an opposite direction. Pretty soon the parties, man and woman, met under the gin house and took seats on the frame immediately beneath me. I soon learned from the conversation that the man was lying in the woods to escape the conscript officer, and that the woman was his wife, who had brought him his supper. While she was spreading the meal for him she was chatting pleasantly about the incidents of the day, telling him among other things how she had won a gold dollar from a simple Texas soldier on his way home on a furlough, and how he 'flirted the gravel' when she showed him the gun—empty gun, etc. I had become intensely interested in the conversation and was trying my best to get a glimpse of the couple over the edge of my scaffold. Leaning too far, the scaffold tilted, when myself and the whole thing came right down between them. They did not wait to investigate the cause of the crash, but lit out, leaving the chicken, bread, milk and other eatables. I gobbled up the pile and crammed it into my haversack, went off a short distance and ate until I was filled. Next morning I was 20 miles away, with a full stomach and a light heart, hitting the ground only in high places as I headed for Texas."

She—"How quiet the cattle are in the meadows!" He—"Well, there are only a few, you see. It takes quite a number of 'em to be heard."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

Would it not be an excellent idea for our Democratic friends, when they are worrying about the completion of their ticket, to nominate Mr. Beard for Treasurer. It would show a disposition on their part to Beard the Republican Lyon in his den.

We seem to have encountered in this county, an age of endorsing. The Democrats and Mugwumps manifest a willingness to endorse heavily the excellent work of the Republican convention. It might be suggested they endorse some of the expense bills of the g. o. p., yet it is doubtful if such endorsement would either add to or detract from their commercial value.

It is stated, and doubtless with truth, that our local Democratic committee is without funds to carry on the campaign. The candidates are wise in not putting up for a hopeless contest, particularly when men who claim to be Republicans are disposed to strike at the Republican ticket unjustly, and advance money for the publication of calumny.

Let the Republicans of this county recollect that a strike will be made covertly against the legislative ticket. It means a direct blow at Senator Stanford, and should his defeat for reelection to the United States Senate result from loss of support in his old home, it will be a matter much to be regretted, and will inflict a sting we do not believe our people intend, if judgment can be formed from the reception he received here on the occasion of his return recently. Were the matter of his reelection left to a direct vote of the people we have no doubt as to the result. There should be no doubt that the vote of the county will be cast for him by representatives pledged to his support.

What is the matter with the stereotyped phrase "the ides of November?" It has been conspicuously absent this campaign. Is it possible it is worn out?

It must be extremely satisfying to the brains and management of the Mugwumps, to be placed in a position to anonymously attack citizens and candidates by innuendo, and afford no opportunity for reply. Such a course is not characterized by common decency and manhood. It is the rule of life that a man who speaks or writes a statement in disparity of another, that he is not willing to hold himself responsible for, or who will assail from behind others, embodies every element that goes to make up a full fledged coward.

It is an interesting problem to reason out just how the Republican party can be held accountable for the high rate of county and city taxes and bad local government, when the Mugwump faction and paid politicians have given the people a full Democratic Board of City Trustees and a Democratic majority in the Board of Supervisors. The straight Republicans did not administer the costly dose the people are receiving.

"ON, STANLEY, ON!"

A young man from the neighboring city of Gougeye has written us inquiring how it came about the Democratic candidate for Sheriff became connected with the war cry that is the caption of this note. We referred the letter of inquiry to our historical editor, and he responds as follows: The phrase "On, Stanley, on," has no application to the Democratic candidate for Sheriff, but had reference to a man back in Scotland. The circumstances were fully written up by Sir Walter Scott, and are briefly these: Mr. Marmion fell in love with two ladies, and like the Mugwumps, could not determine which he wanted, but it seems at the ending neither wanted him. Later on he engaged in some sort of a combat, and got the worst of it; we infer from Mr. Scott's narrative he was badly wiped out. In his expiring moments Mr. Marmion shouted to two gentlemen present: "Charge, Chester, charge! On, Stanley, on!" His evident purpose was to project Mr. Stanley into some fight, and to get Mr. Chester to make such charges as would provide the sinews of war. When Mr. Marmion had fought to a finish and had got the worst of it decidedly, it seems that one of the women he was in love with was present, evidently to tell him what a goose he had made of himself. Concerning his downfall Mr. Scott wrote:

A lady's voice was in his ear,
And that the priest he could not hear,
For that she ever sung,
"In the lost battle, borne down by the flying,
Where mingles war's rattle with groans of the dying!"
So the notes rung:—
"Avoid thee, Fiend;—with ernel hand,
Shake not the dying sinner's hand!—
O look, my son, upon yon sign
Of the Redeemer's grace divine;
O think on faith and bliss!
By many a death bed I have been,
And many a sinner's parting seen,
But never aught like this."
The war, that for a space did fail,
Now trebly thundering swelled the gale,
And STANLEY! was the cry;—
A light on Marmion's visage spread,
And fired his glazed eye;
With dying hand, above his head
He shook the fragment of his blade,
And shouted "Victory!—
Charge, Chester, charge! On, Stanley, on!"
Were the last words of Marmion.

I can well understand, my young friend, how you have confused the two-Mr. Stanleys. Doubtless you thought Mr. Marmion represented the Mugwump party, for like them he was given to shouting, and died before the actual fight terminated. His shout of victory and his getting Mr. Stanley into the fight when he was a gone gosling is a striking parallel with the political situation here now. But history will repeat itself.

There is nothing meaner than wanton attacks upon or insinuations against the Judiciary. It is quite too common for defeated litigants to charge the Courts with venality. Occasionally there are attorneys who descend to accusations against Judges who do not take the same view of the law advocated by them. We note the wanton abuse of a young Judge, who is an aspirant for the Judgeship of one of our Municipal Courts, by some one writing in an advertising column of the Record-Union. George G. Davis is the subject of a charge of venality because of an opinion rendered about three years ago in the case of The People vs. Fitzgerald. We remember the case, and the fact that Judge Davis filed a written opinion, which was published. It was a clear and logical annunciation of the law, and based upon sound principles of justice. There was nothing to warrant the unjust aspersions made by some one at the time, or now. That case was prosecuted by Hon. W. H. Beatty, now Chief Justice, and defended by W. A. Anderson. After adjournment and submission the Court, contrary to its usual custom, and in order to be placed right, devoted time for examination of the law, and put his conclusions in writing. The learned Judge who prosecuted the case, as well as the bar of the city, admitted the correctness of the conclusions of law made by Judge Davis. It was an honest opinion and was sound in law. Fitzgerald was discharged. The other defendant, one Morrissey, was convicted and fined $100. Our independent friends must be reduced to hard lines, when they resort to such vicious means as that invoked against an honest and worthy young man. George G. Davis should be proud of the opinion which these people condemn.

When William Beckman was a member of the Board of Supervisors of this county, it was a critical time in the financial history of the county. The Consolidation Act had been repealed and the common debt apportioned, so that the county's part was six hundred thousand dollars. In addition to this was three hundred thousand dollars in railroad bonds, then came a floating debt of one hundred thousand dollars. The clear-headed financial judgment of William Beckman put the county on a cash basis inside of three years, and by a careful scheme of redemption relieved the county of a great portion of the bonded burden. Had the city been so fortunate as to have such men as Beckman in control of the Municipal Government, we would not now be struggling under our great bonded debt. When the Republican party nominated William Beckman for Railroad Commissioner, it selected the very best man that could be named. Faithful, honest, fearless, and above all, judicious and able.

It was the last Republican Congress that passed the law which declared that eight hours shall constitute a day's labor for all workmen employed by the Government, or who may be engaged by government contractors. This Act establishes a precedent which is of infinite value to the wage-workers. This Republican Congress indorsed the alien contract bill, which prohibits the employment of non-resident aliens for the purpose of taking the place of workingmen in this country. In response to the demand of farmers a bill was passed which provides that every contract or combination in the nature of a trust in restraint of trade or commerce shall be void. Another bill has been passed which protects farmers and their interests: the bill which cuts off the cotton-seed oil trade met the combined opposition of the Democracy, but was passed in protection of the Western farmer. All these progressive and protective measures are the labors of a Republican Congress, and are fitting attendants to that paramount representation of the American idea, the tariff for protection only. When we consider that all these grand governmental projects are passed by a Republican Congress despite the deliberate and premeditated obstructions of the Democracy, is it possible that any man with one grain of Republicanism could find it in his heart to oppose any Republican Congressman, or do anything that might endanger the return of a Republican United States Senator.

All roads from the Republican party lead to the enemy. In every deflection from the ranks of Republicanism, there is always a gain for the Democracy. No matter what the organization may be called, or what its fancied grievance, the result inures to the benefit of the Democracy. In some parts of the common country these movements are called "Alliances," in others "Labor Parties," yet the ultimate result of all is summed up into Democratic victories. History has yet to record one great reform accomplished by any of these movements. While the purposes and objects have been worthy, and sometimes not without cause, yet such has been the true situation, that nothing of a genuine reform has ever been attained. The usual result is the foisting of a few disgruntled politicians into temporary power and official position, whose ultimate course of action disgusts those who are duped into the folly of voting for them. That there is a great necessity for reform in our political party methods we do not deny. We deprecate the means often utilized to defeat the will of the people, and to foist unworthy men into political preferment. But certainly this cannot be remedied by aiding the enemy, whose means are more reprehensible than those of whom we complain. The remedy is not in seeking to defeat the party, but is in making the proper contests in the party lines. As we said in the beginning of this article follow Abraham Lincoln's advice, "Heed the voice of the people."

It is gratifying to know that even with the little feeling manifested in this city in Republican circles, there is absolute unity of sentiment on the State ticket, and whatever dissatisfaction exists relates only to a very few on the county ticket. But right here, after an unbiased consideration of the whole cause or fancied cause of complaint, there does not appear any good or tenable reason why the whole county ticket should not receive the unanimous vote of the Republicans. Our past experience—indeed our very recently past experiences in departing from our party principles and candidates, and electing Democratic municipal officers, should be a warning for the present, and future. We have but to turn to the management of our local municipal affairs to learn a lesson of the absurdity of aiding the enemy. It may be that the Republican party is not perfect—none such has ever existed. But if wrongs are to be righted, liberties and rights of the people protected, the Republican party is the one to do it. We cannot correct an evil by turning over the administration of the Nation, the State, or the county to the Democracy.

That was a pretty poetic idea which imputed to the Oriental magician the cunning gift of being able to put his ear to the ground and detecting from the far-off Bagdad the voice of the prophet as he gave counsel to the faithful, and impart the grave secrets to those about him, and could hear the talk and plans of the citizens as they discussed matters of State. In these times amid the entanglements of a political contest, it does not require the poetic fancy or cunning craft of the magician to foretell events, or to detect the bent of public opinion regarding the results of the present campaign. From all parts of the State come the welcome tidings, that the party which guarded the interests of the Nation for thirty years and whose history is one grand record of worthy deeds, unsurpassed and unsurpassable, is still to be honored and trusted with the supremacy of power. The voice of the people can easily be heard if you put your ear to the ground. When Governor Oglesby of Illinois, was about to start on his famous political career, Abraham Lincoln came to him in that friendly, familiar way that was one of his characteristics and said, "Dick, let me give you a word of advice. It may help you in the future; it may carry you on to success in your political career. It is this: Hold your ear close to the ground that you may hear the voice of the people; heed that voice and I never fear that the people will lead you wrong. Now the voice of the people has spoken upon the great American issues, and has proclaimed that American labor and American industries shall be protected against foreign encroachments. The people have declared upon the silver question. The people have demanded ballot reform and against the methods of the Solid South. It is not safe to heed the counsel of the Democracy against all these great principles. To do so would be only aiding the foreign powers, which are now the only allies of the Democratic idea."

A national contest is going on at this time, which will be consummated on the 4th of November, next, wherein the Republicans are striving to complete and effectuate the great results of the past Congress. The grand measures of progressive government can only be fostered under the hands that created them. It is necessary for the welfare of the Nation that our Republican Congressmen should be returned to the national Legislature. Attempts have been made to alienate Republicans from their party tenets on various pretexts, and to secure the indorsement of those who are against the true American idea. Let us ask, "What have we to gain by electing Democrats, particularly to legislative positions?" From their very constitutional nature, they are enemies to the doctrines of progressive government. Should it happen that through some personal feeling a Republican Congressman is defeated, it might mean the overthrow of all the legislation in favor of the protection to American labor and industries. Should the personal animosity of a few defeat a Republican for the next State Legislature, this might result in sending a Democrat to the United States Senate, thereby endangering the great American idea. In such matters no personal considerations should be allowed to influence the mind of the reasoning Republican. Simply because some of us may not have a warm friendship for candidates for these legislative offices, ought not to influence our votes against them. With these there is a question of principle involved which must sink personalities.

The Southern papers are constantly accusing the Northern people of reviving the memories of the "late unpleasantness," yet we find extended editorials extolling the recent publication of the rebel war songs, designating the same as "Sentimental and Patriotic." There is a perfect fervor of patriotism at the mention of "Maryland, My Maryland." The Southern heart goes out at "Awake Ye Alabamians," "The Virginians," "Stonewall Jackson's Way," not excepting "Dixie." We are told of these treasured remembrances and of the beauty, strength and pathos of the hundreds of gems which are written and sung around the Southern camp-fire. Should we, however, refer to the loyal patriotic sentiment of those who were arrayed against them, or mention the Union soldier's camp-fire, then we are charged with "waving the bloody shirt." We must not mention our old battle songs, because they hurt the sensitive natures of our Southern brothers.

We are pleased to note that our reference last week to the neglect of certain officials, in taking proper steps to realize on the newly issued Street Improvement bonds, had the effect to cause action in the right direction. Ten thousand dollars of the funds of the Funded Debt Commission have been utilized. Better that, than using the money to redeem some old non-interest bearing securities.

HE STAYED IN BED.

"I think I'll stay in bed to-day," remarked John Henry Peddicord, when the alarm clock went off at 7 a few mornings ago. "I don't feel very well, and I read a few days since an article by a prominent physician, in which he said if people would go to bed and stay there a whole day in every month, and keep quiet, they would live to a good old age."

"Well, I think I would," said Mrs. John Henry Peddicord, encouragingly. "You have been complaining of a severe headache for several days, and I have become quite anxious about you." So John Henry turned himself on his pillow and settled himself for his unwonted luxury.

He had just got to sleep again when the baby woke up. The baby had not read the learned article by the prominent physician, and it would have had no effect on her if she had. She was opposed to sleep on general principles, and at any time, day or night, and only succumbed at the latter time from dire necessity, when she could no longer prop her eyes open. But stay in bed all day? Never!

Baby's waking was the signal for her mamma to rise. "John Henry, love," said Mrs. Peddicord, "as you are not going to get up, I think I'll let you amuse baby while I dress. The girl is busy this morning, it's ironing morning, you know. It'll be such a help."

So while Mrs. Peddicord dressed, John Henry Peddicord tried to amuse the baby, but the attempt was not a gigantic success. The baby wanted to get up and begin its day's work, but John Henry, having resolved to put into practice the prominent physician's theory, could not accede to the infant's demand, though it was supported by much heavy wailing.

To assist in the great work of amusing baby, Mrs. John Henry Peddicord unloaded on the bed a varied assortment of toys. There were dolls, tin wagons, locomotives, building blocks, and the like.

By the aid of these adjuncts to infantile pacification and the expenditure of more vital force than an entire day's work at the office would consume, John Henry kept the baby in a state of comparative quiet for 10 minutes; and the word "comparative" is used advisedly.

By this time Mrs. John Henry Peddicord was dressed.

"I'll take the baby now and dress her," she said. "I'm sure she hasn't bothered you much, love. She's dust as dood as dodd, she is mommer's 'tittle toddles."

The second half of Mrs. John Henry's remarks were addressed to the baby, not to John Henry.

"Mommer" took the baby, and John Henry snuggled into his pillow for another snooze. He had scarcely got to sleep when he was awakened by the wife of his bosom:

"I'll go and bring up your breakfast, love, if you'll just mind the baby while I go down stairs for it. There's the breakfast bell now. Baby will be good, I'm sure. I'll set her on the bed and you can play with her."

But baby had some conscientious scruples or something about going to bed just after dressing, and she filed several emphatic protests which the disappearance of her mamma did not tend to render less energetic.

This time John Henry's efforts to assuage the grief of his child were utterly unavailing. He endeavored to explain to her that the features of Edna, the chubby rubber doll, were worthy of more than a casual glance, but baby would not listen. Equally unavailing were his efforts to point out the wonderful beauties of a "choo choo" locomotive.

But finally Mrs. John Henry came to her lord's assistance, and carried off the baby, while he sat up in bed, propped with pillows, ate his buttered toast and his boiled eggs, drank his coffee, and thought that the prominent physician's idea was not such a bad one after all.

His breakfast eaten, John Henry Peddicord lay and dozed and lazily dreamed for perhaps half an hour, when his wife invaded the bedroom again.

She had an idea.

"John Henry," she said, "I've no end of shopping to do, and I just believe I'll go to-day, while you are at home. No one can take care of the baby as well as you. I feel so much safer when you are at home with baby, dear, and you won't mind, will you, love?"

John Henry groaned inwardly.

Oh, no, he would not mind it at all. And he didn't, for a whole half hour after Mrs. Peddicord disappeared. The baby had been fed, and for the space of 30 minutes thereafter was a model of angelic sweetness. Then came a change, however, and the infant became more exacting.

John Henry performed various gymnastic evolutions on the bed for the benefit of one infant, which were duly applauded until the spectator desired a change of programme, and made her desire known very promptly.

Presently Mr. Peddicord arrived at the conclusion that a day in bed every month may be an excellent thing, but it should be taken undiluted with babies.

After Mrs. Peddicord had been gone an hour, John Henry thought this thing of staying at home to rest was a delusion and a snare, and he tried to concoct a good reason for foregoing his resolution of following the prominent physician's advice.

"To be sure," he thought, "there's that business with Sparrowgrass I ought to have attended to months ago. He lives in Frogville, fifteen miles away, over a very rough road, and I've been putting it off because it's a nasty job to do, but it's a mighty sight easier to do than mind this baby."

John Henry dressed himself and took the baby down stairs where the girl was ironing.

"Nora," said he, "I'm sorry to interrupt your ministrations at the ironing board, but I find it necessary to go to the country and I'll have to leave the baby with you. When Mrs. Peddicord returns tell her I received a telegram calling me away on very important business, and that I shall not be back before 9 or 10 o'clock to-night, and perhaps not before to-morrow morning."

"Yes, sorr," replied Nora, as she assumed charge of "mommer's 'tittle toddles," and John Henry bounded out of the house with an exhilaration over his new-found freedom such as he had not felt since he was a schoolboy.—W. H. Siviter in Drake's Magazine for October.

The Princess Maria Anna of Portugal is apparently a woman of good sense. She is to marry an untitled doctor of medicine, and when asked how she could marry a person of such low rank when so many princely suitors were at her disposal she replied: "I prefer to marry a man without a name, rather than a name without a man."

"A theatre for deaf mutes is to be established at Paris," remarked Entriestle. "No comedies will be played there," said Beerfoam. "Why not?" "Because nobody will be able to hear a joke cracked."

Fred Douglass says "there is no race problem in this country." The man that bets on the wrong horse thinks there is.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

AFTER THE CURTAIN.

The prelude of the orchestra was ending
In one grand burst of melody sublime,
Then quivering away, in sweetness blending,
As soft as breezes in the summer-time.
Then, as it closed, a murmur of emotion
Swept round the crowded hall with sud den swell,
Half like the distant sounding of the ocean,
And then it died, as tinkling rang the bell.

In raiment of soft satins, silks and laces,
With gems and jewels in the light aglow,
Were women wondrous fair, with eager faces,
As rose the curtain, silently and slow;
And men, who but a moment since were blending
Their voices with music's tender strain,
Now silent stood, their gaze impatient bending
The first unfolding of the scene to gain.

The opera was that of some old master,
Whose strains are lasting as the hills of time;
Whose music makes the human heart beat faster
And dream of Heav'n and everything sublime.
And then she came, for whom the crowd was waiting,
A queenly woman, beautiful to see,
And though she smiled, I knew her heart was hating
In all this hollow mockery to be.

I saw her face, framed in the sheen and shimmer
Of colored lights and painted scenes of bloom,
But back of all the footlights' glare and glimmer
Were hidden signs of sadness and of gloom.
I heard her voice soar like the lark of morning,
As skilfully to arias she sang,
But in it all to me was woe and warning,
And in each note a deep foreboding rang.

The opera was done, the song was ended,
About her feet fair flowers in masses lay;
Applause and praise with happiness were blended,
So thought the crowd that turned and went away.
She did not pause to choose a single flower,
Nor cast her raiment of the stage aside;
For every moment seemed an endless hour,
Alas, she had no thought of praise and pride.

Another face, white as a lily, lying Upon the pillow; slowly the moments flew;
A little voice for mother vainly crying.
"She sang," they said, "as none but she could do."
And then she came, close to her bosom taking
Her little darling's golden head;
Her heart could find no tears, for it was breaking;
The mother prayed to die—the child was dead.

The last song of her life is ever ended.
She comes no more to charm the eager throng;
The curtain on the last scene has descended,
The walls no more re-echo with her song.
Her name, perhaps, is sometimes idly spoken,
They wonder where she is who sang so well;
I think of her and know her heart was broken,
And thus upon her life the curtain fell.

A new comic opera by Planquette entitled Paul Jones has replaced the Merry Monarch at the Broadway Theater.

Herr Strauss has inadvertently burned the third act of a new opera with a lot of trash. Usually the first act is most deserving of incineration.

Blue Jeans, a new sensational comedy by Joseph Arthur, was given its initial presentation at the Fourteenth Street Theater on Monday evening.

The mother of the German Empress was present at the Passion Play recently, and, seated on a chair which cost ten marks, saw the whole play.

The new Garden Theater was opened on Saturday night (September 27th), with Dr. Bill, a farcical comedy which was fairly successful in London.

If the American girl would only take a hint from the brevity of her bathing costume and build a theater hat on the same principles, how happy a million men would be.

One of the lions in Nero, which is to be the winter attraction at Niblo's in New York, rides a bicycle, and another settles all disputes between the management and the members of the company.

Helen Dauvray's return to the stage was inaugurated at the Standard, Tuesday night (September 30), in The Whirlwind, a new comedy of Sidney Rosenfeld's, which treats of speculation and Wall street.

"Carmen Sylva," the Queen of Roumania, has read a tragedy to Henry Irving. The result was enthusiasm, but no arrangement for a production. The gifted Queen has yet to discover that there is no royal road to the metropolitan stage.

Mr. Henrik Ibsen and Mr. Edmund Gosse have concluded to play into each other's hands in the matter of a new play by the former, who has conveyed to the latter his English and American rights, the consideration or one of the considerations, being that Mr. Gosse is to publish an English version in London and the day the original appears in Copenhagen.

Among the great prima donnas of the past was Margareta de l'Epine, who was a reigning favorite for over twenty years. She was in her prime about 1710, when she made a special triumph in Buononcini's Almahide. Singer and opera are both forgotten, and the composer is only remembered through a silly stanza coupling his name with that of Handel.

Gounod once said: "Wagner is a wonderful prodigy, an aberration of genius, a visionary haunted by all that is colossal, he cannot estimate aright the powers of his brain. With no sense of measure or of proportion in his mind, he flies beyond the limits of human observation, and face to face with his prodigious endeavors, his gigantic labors, and his overwhelming expenditure of talent and hard work, one feels tempted to quote to him the cruel remark of Agnes to her lover Arnulphe: 'Horace in two words would make more of it than you.'"

Among the pretty dances adopted at the annual meeting of the National Association of Professors of Dancing in their recent four days' session at Brooklyn, are the "Oxford Minuet," the "New Vienna Waltz," the "Melange Quadrille," the "Elite Lancers" and "L'Eclairc Waltz." Seventy professors, from all parts of the country, were present at the meeting. They examined and performed each of the hundred or more dances submitted for approval and after considerable debate decided upon thirty "round" and "square" dances, the most prominent of which, as named above, are likely to win great favor the coming season.

Mr. Burnand, the editor of Punch, has joined the large army of people in this world who have a distinct and well-defined grievance against critics. There is no question that Mr. Burnand has been wronged. He wrote a piece, and it was to have been produced on Tuesday night. It was postponed, however, to allow more time for rehearsal. The morning after the original date set for the production there appeared in a London journal a column and a half of review of the piece, in which Mr. Burnand and his literary offspring were handled in a fashion that would even make Mr. Sullivan blush. The critic was particularly vivid in his description of the disgust that audience had manifested during the performance of the play. The little incident has supplied Mr. Burnand with an endless amount of news to write about. It may not be known that a similar thing occurred in this city last week. A new opera was reviewed at great length in spite of the fact that the opera has not yet been performed. The paper publishing the review was so unimportant, however, that the incident has passed practically unnoticed. —New York World.

Zenas Dane, in Drake's Magazine: "Now, I'll tell you about the play before the curtain goes up, so you'll understand and enjoy it all the more," said Saida to Maida before the curtain rose for Mary Anderson to appear in "A Winter's Tale." "It's a perfectly lovely play, and you'll say so, too, after you've seen it. You see, Hermonie is the wife of—have another chocolate, won't you? They're lovely, aren't they? I'm awfully fond of them, aren't you? Well, Hermonie is the wife of King Leontes, and he gets horribly jealous of her and Polixenes, king of Bohemia, although he hasn't the least earthly reason for his jealousy, for Hermonie is just as innocent as you or I, poor thing! I despise a jealous man, don't you? If I was married to one I'd flirt desperately just to torment the wretch. Well, Leontes completely paralyzes poor Hermonie by accusing her of—have another caramel, do. No, you hain't had enough, nonsense! Take another, do! Well, Leontes accuses Hermonie of loving Polixenes and sends her to prison, like the wretch he was, and you must cry when it comes to that part of the play, because you simply can't help it. So Hermonie goes to prison, and while there she has a lovely little girl baby born to her and sends it to Leontes and he cuts up like fury and says perfectly dreadful things about poor Hermonie, and Paulina, she's the woman who brings in the baby, she talks right up to him and tells him that the dear baby is his, and there's no use of him trying to deny it and—" "Is it a real baby?" Maida asks. "Oh, mercy, no! It couldn't be, you know. It'd be sure to cry, and that would spoil everything. It's just a dummy baby, but they act as though it were the real article, and—you've got to have another caramel. You've taken but four and I've eaten ten, at least. Take another; yes, you will, too. There now, I've dropped six in your lap and you'll have to eat them. Well, what does that abominable Leontes do but order that poor innocent baby sent off to Bohemia, and it his own flesh and blood, as he finds out afterward, if he hasn't sense enough to know it at the time, the idiot! Well, then comes the trial scene, and it's lovely, too. You must get your handkerchief out for that. Poor Hermonie is brought in looking like a dead woman, and no wonder. The court-crier, I s'pose it is, reads the charge to her, and of course, she gets up and says there isn't a word of truth in it, and she makes them bring in something or other they call Apollo's oracle. I don't know just how that is; anyhow, it says she's perfectly innocent, and—oh, the curtain's going up. I can't tell you the rest, but you'll understand it after all what I've told you, and you'll think her too lovely for anything in the dance. It's just beautiful!"

Book Chat.

Sir Edwin Arnold, author of the "Light of Asia," will shed the light of his countenance upon us next year. He expects to spend several months in this country and will probably return to the "tight little island," with material enough to make a very readable book on America. If he succeeds in making his book on America both readable and truthful, he will do more than is accomplished by the majority of English tourists and litterateurs.

Mr. Howells is engaged in a short serial story for Harper's, which, it is suggested, embodies some of the results of his Saratoga observations during the past season.

Mrs. Nice—"My dear, that book is not fit for you to read!" Her Niece—"How do you know, auntie?" Mrs. Nice—"Why I've read it twice, my dear!"

Mr. Gladstone is soon to publish another of his many unsatisfactory monographs of which the "Prince of Poets" is the unhappy subject. It is entitled "Landmarks of Homeric Study," and is to be considered under that large and suggestive heading—peace, war, religion, politics, ethics, geography and whatnot besides. This is probably the book which Mr. Gladstone has stated was designed for American readers.

Since being born to beauty and to light,
Is being born to sorrow and decay;
Since for each triumph there's a wrong to right,
And envy steals the charm of fame away:
Since earth to-day is green and skies are clear,
And birds into the night their strains prolong,
To-morrow's world another face may wear,
And winter strip the earth of flower and song;
Since every day must have its end in night,
And only now and then the moon can shine;
Since weakness is the end of human might,
And 'twixt the great and small death draws no line—
Why should we cling to life as to a spar,
When heaven and rest are just across the bar?

Professional Chat.

In an Episcopal church near Boston the other Sunday a lady in passing up the aisle caught her dress on a corner of a pew and tore it. As the process of tearing was very audible to the congregation the feelings of the lady may be imagined, when at that moment the clergyman began the service by reading the sentence: "Rend your heart and not your garments."

Doctor—"Your services are required at Mr. Poorman's late residence. He died this morning." Undertaker—"How much did he leave?" "Not over $1,000." "What will your bill be?" "About $400." "Well, I'll bury him for the rest."

Judge—"This verdict could not have been reached on law and evidence." Foreman—"No, sir; we just used common sense." Judge (promptly)—"Overruled and set aside."

Justice is always represented as holding the scales. It often happens that some other power holds the scales over the eyes of the intelligent juror, in these days.

Henry Ward Beecher once received a letter from a young man who recommended himself as an honest man, and closed with this request: "Get me an easy situation that honesty may be rewarded." Mr. Beecher replied: "Don't be an editor if you want to be 'easy.' Do not try the law. Avoid school keeping. Keep out of the pulpit. Let alone all ships, stores, shops and merchandise. Be not a farmer or a mechanic, neither a soldier nor a sailor. Don't study, don't think, don't work. None of them are easy. Oh, my honest friend, you are in a very hard world! I know of but one easy place in it. That is the grave."

Ropes is the name of one of the lawyers working in behalf of the heirs of the late lamented Benjamin Franklin. Is he roping them in?

A young woman who had successfully passed an examination for official stenographer of one of the Montreal Courts, was barred out by the objection of one of the barristers practicing in the Court, a Mr. Achambault, Q. C. How the learned gentleman, who thus objects to women having anything to do with the administration of the law can bring his proud soul to brook the title of Queen's Counsel, is one of the insoluble problems of life.

An amusing case was heard at the Leigh Police Court, when James Pemberton was summoned for being drunk. Mr. T. H. Hope, a solicitor, appeared for the defense, and submitted a man was not drunk unless he was incapable or disorderly, and the question was raised, What constitutes drunkenness? The answer had been put in rhyme, as follows:

He is not drunk who from the floor
Can rise, and drink, and ask for more;
But drunk is he who prostrate lies,
Without the strength to drink or rise.

The case was dismissed, and the charge withdrawn.

Political.

On Saturday night the Clunie Opera House was filled to overflowing at the meeting that was addressed by Mayor Pond and Colonel Irish. It is a matter of gratification that we can say, from a Republican standpoint, that such a token of respect was shown here for candidates for distinguished offices nominated by the Democratic Convention; and of this meeting it can be said with truth that very many Republicans attended, and many others would had the accommodations been more ample.

On Tuesday night Joseph McKenna, the Republican candidate for Congressman from this district, addressed the citizens of Folsom, in company with the county candidates, and an excursion train of seven cars carried there members of the uniformed clubs of this city. On Wednesday night Mr. McKenna spoke at Galt, and Thursday night, after the parade, addressed the citizens of Sacramento. On the 30th, so far as the Republicans are concerned, will be held the last State meeting of the campaign, and it will be addressed, after the parade, by Senator Leland Stanford and Hon. Thomas Fitch.

Concerning county and city politics, circumstances have occurred, which in plainness, it must be said, are not creditable to the few who have been instrumental in the attempt to create a factional fight against a portion of the Republican ticket. The people understand the actions of men and of political parties perhaps much better than do the few who seek to control the opinions and judgment of the masses. The facts are these, so far as the Republican organization is concerned: That, in obedience to a call issued by the late Republican Committee, a convention was selected from the body of the Republican voters of the county, which consisted of 223 delegates, representative of all classes. That body met, and with few exceptions, gave unanimous endorsement to the nominations that were made. It is hardly possible that it can be maintained that their action was dictated by influences other than good judgment and conscience. After the adjournment of that convention, the Democratic Convention met, selected a Central Committee, and Mr. Leake was chosen Chairman of the executive body of his party. The writer had been, by unanimous assent of the Republican Convention, elected Chairman of the Republican Committee. Upon the election of Mr. Leake, the usual amenities passed between the Chairmen of the two Committees, which meant that the people of this community would not be offended by a filthy campaign, and it was understood, as it had been in the campaigns of the last eight years, that a respectable and dignified contest would be conducted. The people have doubtless observed that neither from the Democratic nor Republican side has there come a word of calumny or detraction against any gentleman who has been presented from any quarter for political favor. However, it has come, and with regret we say it, the campaign has developed that there are some in this community who are willing to strike from ambush. Some gentlemen have issued a "declaration of principles." If the innuendos they charge are based on facts, no good citizen will hesitate to support them; but when a general charge is made that our courts and juries are corrupted, it certainly should not be inferred that the denunciation should apply to the innocent as well as the guilty—if any are guilty. So far as our courts are concerned, they are presided over by Judges Van Fleet and Armstrong.

The gentlemen responsible for this covert charge certainly do not mean their reference is to Judge Van Fleet, for they have endorsed him; and they do not insinuate it against Judge Catlin, the other Republican nominee, for he also has received their endorsement. Do they then wish to be understood as directing this insinuation against Judge Armstrong? It would seem very unreasonable, as the judgment of the people is vastly different from that of the few who have arrogated to themselves the political purity of the entire county. Judge Armstrong is a Democrat, and is known to be a straight party man. He served four years upon the Superior Court bench by appointment first from Governor Stoneman, and next from Governor Bartlett. Two years ago he ran for the office upon the Democratic ticket before the people, and the great popular jury of this county elected him to the place he now fills by a majority of 270, while at the same election, Mr. Harrison, for President of the United States, carried the county by a majority of 1317. Such a compliment is rarely accorded, and certainly it is unreasonable to say that the people, after four years of experience, would give such endorsement to a judge whom they believed to be corrupt.

With relation to the insinuation that there has been corruption of juries in the offices of County Clerk, Sheriff and District Attorney, we will do Mr. Hamilton the justice to say that this attack upon the honesty of his administration is repudiated, and it strikes us strangely that the intimation should come from persons who profess friendship for him, that his office has been used during his administration to pervert justice.

The Sheriff and District Attorney have little to do as far as the selection of juries is concerned, except that the Sheriff, when ordered by the Court to summon special jurors makes the selections and returns his venire to the Court. Any party interested has the right to challenge his talesmen upon the ground of bias or prejudice of himself or any of his deputies concerned in their selection, and that question is passed upon absolutely by the presiding judge.

The District Attorney has nothing whatever to do with the selection and drawing of jurors, and simply acts, as does the lawyer for the defendant, to protect the interests of his client—the people. It will strike any one as strange that any District Attorney should commit professional and political suicide by exerting, if he could, an influence to select a jury that would acquit in a case where he could convict, and receive the credit for the conviction. Professional pride is too strong with lawyers; they desire all possible success.

The fact is apparent to every one of intelligence, that the judges of the Courts are in duty bound to protect public interests in the administration of justice, and if it should appear that any subordinate officer violated his sworn trust and attempted to secure a packed jury, there is no doubt he would be called to strict accountability by them.

The gentlemen running the side show seem to object to Sheriff McMullen, but against him make no specific charge. Mr. McMullen has been a farmer in this county for many years, and served on the Board of Supervisors. Two years ago he was elected Sheriff. He has made an efficient officer, and if anything has been charged against his integrity or capacity we are not aware of it, and doubtless never will be if we await a definite arraignment by the Knights of the Dark Circle.

Joseph Sims, the nominee of the Republican Convention for Assessor, is regarded, it would seem, by the disciples of purity, as a bad and corrupt man. He came to this State in 1846, a member of the Stevenson regiment, and after the conquest of California, settled in this county and has since followed farming. Particularly what he has done during his long residence here that merits a charge of dishonesty or incapacity, we know not.

Frank D. Ryan, the Republican nominee for District Attorney, was born in Sacramento city, and has constantly resided here since except during the time he was at college. He served one term in the Assembly and was twice Chief Clerk of that body. Is it charged that he has been or will be dishonest, or that he is incompetent?

W. W. Rhoads, the nominee for County Clerk, has been for six years a deputy in that office—a man of exemplary habits, and against whom no suspicion of dishonesty or incapacity has ever been whispered. He has discharged his official duties honestly and with good judgment and ability, and has won the respect and confidence of all with whom he has been thrown in contact. He made a manly fight for his nomination; he won it fairly.

The "law abiding citizens," or such of them as have assumed to do the thinking for the people, have gone to the expense of publishing anonymous cards in the newspapers, containing insinuations of an indefinite nature against citizens. To such matters attention is not usually paid, for the people are just enough to judge of the motives of those who are so cowardly as to vilify without affording an opportunity for reply or defense. It is evident, however, that such men as Newton Booth, R. S. Carey, L. B. Mohr, Philip Herzog, H. A. Burnett, John Stevens, General Tozer, Major Heilbron, E. A. Burr, Wm. Hook, C. H. Krebs, John Weil, M. Fay, A. Leonard, and some others on the list, could not have given their sanction to the following, directed against one they have known for years as a trusted officer of the Courts, and for whose integrity and political independence we believe they would cheerfully vouch, were those qualities seriously questioned:

"AN UNFORTUNATE COMPARISON."

In an open letter which Winfield J. Davis, the Chairman of the Republican County Central Committee, has addressed to Major C. H. Hubbard, Chairman of the Citizens' organization, Mr. Davis invites a comparison between the record and attitude of himself and Major Hubbard in political matters. The comparison thus invited is an unfortunate one for Chairman Davis, and, as made by citizens, will not be complimentary to him. Chairman Davis, though himself pure as the driven snow, has a singular facility of always swallowing with a grin whatever political dose is mixed for him by the bosses and of constantly associating himself with those who are not in politics for their health.

The letter of Mr. Davis did not invite a comparison between the record and attitude of Major Hubbard and himself. It was drawn out by a letter which the Major published. In our letter we said that Major Hubbard had voted at the Republican primary under a call that pledged him to support in good faith the Republican ticket; that he had participated in the deliberations of the convention as a delegate, and did not dissent from its actions, and we expressed surprise that a gentleman of his standing would disregard a pledge he voluntarily took. Our letter ended with these words:

"With relation to the candidates against whom you gentlemen are striking, I respectfully invite you to put on paper your objections to their integrity and ability in so specific a way that the people can understand it, for they have a right to know; and I will assure you, if you can convince me, as a reasonable man, that the Republican Convention has made any mistake and has nominated men not entitled to public confidence, I will vote to remove them from the ticket; otherwise, I assure you I will not do an injustice, and will respect the implied wishes of yourself and other members of the Republican County Convention."

We will do Major Hubbard the justice to say that we do not believe he was consulted or sanctioned the publication of the advertisement concerning us—he is known to be a gentleman. To insinuations and innuendoes from anonymous quarters we will not descend to reply, and are willing our life and political record shall be passed upon by the people, who are always just. However it is, from having filled the position of Chairman of the Republican Committee twice before, we were conscious, from experience, that to perform the duties of the office with fidelity and firmness, would subject us to the coarse abuse of the lesser and the undying enmity of the greater.

The Republican Convention has placed a ticket in our hands to elect, and all honorable means will be resorted to to accomplish that result. Our course of duty is plainly defined, and it will be pursued despite the consciousness we have that we will incur resentments that will follow us to the grave. Innuendoes such as we have referred to we expected, but in starting into this campaign we equipped with padded trousers, and any personal or political enemy disposed to kick us can do so to his heart's content and meet with indifference on our part.

As we stated, it has been agreed between the Chairman of the Republican and Democratic Committees that filth should not be thrown—that the campaign should be conducted in a manly and dignified manner. The people will observe that that compact has been kept. It is but just to the Democratic Committee to say they are in no wise concerned in the mud mill that has been set in operation. Whatever of a personal nature may be directed against our candidates or ourself will receive no answer—the people are the judge and the jury; they will be just, and to their arbitrament we will submit.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Still Alarm Company will hold the boards in this city for two nights, October 27th and 29th.

Carlton's English Opera Company will be with us for a season of two nights, October 30th and November 1.

At the Clunie Opera House last night Hoyt & Thomas' new farce, A Trip to Chinatown was given. There was much life, mirth and music in the "night off." Ollie Archmere is the stage name of a Sacramento girl (Della Berry) and who has developed into a first-class comedy actress. Tonight A Trip to Chinatown again.

Thos. W. Keene, while a sterling actor, failed to infuse any enthusiasm in his Shakespearean season in Sacramento. There is something lacking in Mr. Keene's rendition of Richard III. He is too tame in parts, and too boisterous in other portions of Bulwer's great creation. As "Shylock," he appeared to better advantage. Keene is an excellent "Richard." We like him better than Warde in this character. It once was urged against Keene that he rant too much. We fear that this criticism has driven him to the other extreme. Even in our splendid little Metropolitan Theatre, there are many portions of the play that are positively unintelligible, through his indistinct enunciation. Mr. Keene will doubtless leave Sacramento with a poor opinion of her judgment of art.

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

It is rumored on the streets that the star chamber organization in this city have determined to print on their tickets the names of the Democratic nominees for the Assembly, and that the strike against Senator Stanford will be made at the last moment. The action of the persons who have delegated to themselves the control of the political thought of the people is secret; they seem not to be in a position to act openly, and if judgment from their past course will throw light on the future, it will be expected they will attack Mr. Stanford at a time when he will have no opportunity for defense.

It is regretted to observe that the anglo-maniac young man with the trousers of a Sing Sing convict and the manners of a blanching gorilla is again with us.

NOTES.

That fellow who invented the "pigs in the clover" puzzle has been sent to an insane asylum. Here indeed is a clear case of retribution.

The Republican papers of Wisconsin are quoting on their Lutheran opponents this saying of Martin Luther: "I hold that magistrates ought to force parents to send their children to school."

It is claimed for some of the "Independents" that they have long heads. Well, that speaks for naught. Mules have long heads also. Might it not be true that there is a little "swellhead" in this matter.

It is said that the Prince of Wales is traveling around in disguise. There might be danger that the kingly bearing and features would reveal his identity. It is one of the tenets of royalty that there is a halo around the king at all times.

One of the select clubs in Paris refused to admit a Jewish nobleman. Shortly after he bought the Club building for a million dollars, and fixed as a condition of a renewal of the Club lease, that he be admitted as a member of the Club.

Senator Ingalls says: "A man ought to believe that his wife is the best, his children the most attractive, his city, his State, and his country the noblest and most deserving of his devotion, or he is not worthy of having a wife, children, city, State or country."

It will not be long now when a large number of patriots who were anxious to serve the good people and sit near the county's strong box, will be wondering how the people could be so ungrateful as not to recognize their claims. The other fellows will laugh.

It is not generally known that the custom of keeping birthdays is many thousands of years old. It is recorded in the fourth chapter of Genesis, twentieth verse: "And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, that he made a feast unto all his servants."

The Democratic antagonism to the protection of home industries and labor, are "like little boys who swim on bladders," they are in far beyond their depth. By the way, bladders are on the free list, the cheapness of which may account for the Democratic ability to keep their heads above water.

There is much sentiment as well as truth in that new college girl's song which runs thus:

Life is all a grind;
Yes, all a grind
'Tis to my mind;
Though many joys some find,
Yet life is all a grind.

"Another person died of heart failure," says a reporter. A physician would tell us that this is about as sensible as saying "Another person died for the want of breath." There is nothing accurate or definite in attributing death to "heart failure." All deaths are the result of the failure of the heart to perform its functions.

This is an age when everybody seems to desire to get rich without any adequate investment. Many aspirants for office have an idea that if fortune should favor them by placing them in official position, that it becomes a license to capture all the wealth that comes within their reach. The question of a competent administration of their duties and the law, is only a secondary affair.

The stimulation of manufactures by the new tariff will be of vast general benefit. It will increase the value created within the country's limits, which is the true, sure measure of national wealth. It will give more employment to labor. It will build up a class of consumers. It will thus increase the demand for things the farmer raises and enhance their prices. It will make a better market for raw material of every kind.

The great overshadowing question of the day is that of labor. It is of far reaching importance to the people of this country. The Republican party is the only true friend of labor. The wage worker must per force look to the liberal tenets of Republicanism for any substantial recognition. The protective tariff is solely in the interest of the American laborer. All measures for the welfare of the American laborer are the offspring of the liberal principles of Republicanism.

The most absolute idiocy regarding the tariff that is indulged in by anybody is the talk of "duties for the exclusive benefit of the manufacturers." As though it were possible for any legislative measure to exclusively benefit any one class. If the manufacturers are benefitted by the new tariff bill it must be through the increase of their profits. If their profits are increased they will enlarge their operations. They will buy more raw material. They will employ more labor. Then will not others be benefitted? Those who prate of the tariff being for the exclusive benefit of the manufacturer either wilfully misrepresent or else they have so little discernment that they cannot see beyond the immediate results of any measure. In short, their talk is either the inspiration of mendacity or the prompting of stupidity.

That was a grand reception given McKenna and Reddick on Thursday night. It was a happily conceived idea in President P. E. Platt to give such a graphic epitome of the work of Hon. Jos. McKenna in Congress, After that no one should have had the hardihood to sneeringly ask, "What has Joe McKenna done?" Mr. Platt disclosed the fact that no Congressman or representative from the Coast has ever done as much as McKenna for the district, State and nation. McKenna's speech was a clear and lucid exposition of the various great Republican measures in Congress, and was a finished and scholarly effort. John B. Reddick did not attempt a set speech, but dealt some humorous and sarcastic hits at the enemy. The Sutter Club entertained McKenna and Reddick after the meeting.

The poet clings to the dead past. They don't want to keep step with advancing utilities. Although the mowing machine has supplanted the scythe, the bard still cuts his grass in the old style.

The mowers in the meadow land,
Where grass is long and lithe,
With brawny arm and ready hand
Swing the keen-gleaming scythe.

The poet and Democratic free traders are about alike in clinging to the dead past. Judging from Colonel Irish's speech the other night, he would relegate us all to the times when there were no machines, and that the good old way of handsewing and manual labor produced everything. Colonel Irish believes in cutting grass in the old style.

Religious Services.

An invitation has been extended to the First Artillery Regiment (field, staff and brigade officers) by the Rev. John F. Von Herrlich, Chaplain of the Regiment, to attend a religious service at St. Paul's Episcopal Church, corner Eighth and I streets, on the evening of October 26th, at 7:30 o'clock p. m. The music on the occasion will be rendered by the First Artillery Band, under the direction of Professor Neale, assisted by the organist and choir of St. Paul's Church. The invitation having been accepted, Companies A, B, E, G, field, staff, non-commissioned staff and band will assemble at Armory Hall in full uniform, on Sunday, October 26th, at 7 o'clock p. m. sharp.

Ladies of the Grand Army.

Mrs. C. E. Shirland of this city, President of the Encampment of the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, is making a tour of the State, visiting local organizations of the Order, and instituting new camps. On Tuesday evening Mrs. Shirland was given a reception at San Jose by the Ladies of the G. A. R.

Hereafter a commercial lunch will be served at the Café Royal, corner of 7th and J streets. This will be welcomed by the business men as the lunch will be first class in every respect, and at popular price. *

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos. *

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street. *

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of R. S. McClure, an insolvent debtor.

R. S. McClure having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said R. S. McClure is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the said R. S. McClure, insolvent debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to such insolvent, to him, or to any person, firm, corporation or association for his use. And the said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property, until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Hon. John W. Armstrong, Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 31st day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock, p. m. of that day, to prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in THEMIS, a newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.
Dated Sept. 25, 1890

JOHN W. ARMSTRONG,
Judge of the Superior Court.
W. A. ANDERSON,
Attorney for Insolvent.

A Ballad of Interrogation.

Great are the mysteries voters must suffer,
Hard are the guesses their wits that fatigue!
Who was the Man in the Iron Buffer?
Who are these candidates of the League?
Who was the father of Zebedee's children?
Who was it struck Billy Patterson?
Oh, for a voter this thought is bewild'rin'—
Who are these new men the Fusionists run?

Who was it first wrote the letters of Junius?
Who first discovered Columbia's shores?
Who, to a borrower, was first impecunious?
Was it Noah who "rested" the first on "his oars?"

Who was the beauty who wore the first garter?

Who first blew into an unloaded gun?
Why are the offices objects of barter?
Who are these new men the Fusionists run?

Is Business in Politics but a delusion?
Is iridescence an Ingalesque dream?
Is there a Grace that is saving by fusion?
Are things quite different or just what they seem?

Must only candidates wear a fine halo
Who have been fused in a crucible glum?
Who gets the ducks—the sleek hunters who "lay low?"
Or the sportsmen who go for a hunt with a drum?

Cæsar's Prerogative.

"Ah, what glorious days they were when stock companies held the fort!" sighed the old tragedian.

"Some funny things happened in those days," remarked the stage manager. "My father, who lived and died a member of the Boston Museum Company, used to tell a story of the elder Booth that illustrates one of the beauties of the system. The elder Booth was the star to come, and previous to his arrival a number of the members of the company fell sick, and for this reason the low comedian had to be pressed into a role for which he was in no wise fitted, namely, Julius Cæsar. He was a round-bodied, merry souled little fellow, and notoriously fond of what we nowadays call "guying," on and off the stage. My father, who was to play "Marc Anthony," cautioned the comedian not to play any jokes upon Booth, who did not like trifling of any sort. They rehearsed Julius Cæsar, and everything went well till Booth, as "Brutus," in the assassination scene, struck Cæsar with his dagger.
"Cæsar," according to custom, ought to have fallen dead at the base of Pompey's statue, and the comedian had been particularly cautioned to respect the tradition. But he chose, out of pure contrariness, to die further up the stage. Booth gave the prostrate Cæsar a gentle kick, and bade him angrily roll over to the right place. To the whole company's horror, instead of obeying, the comedian sat up, and said: 'Look here,
Mr. Booth, I'm "Julius Cæsar," and I'll die where I d— please!"
"Another actor played "Cæsar" during Booth's engagement."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Nice Little Dog Story.

Two dogs were playing together with a toy whip. The Irish terrier, momentarily losing his temper, made a snap and snarled at his companion, who immediately turned tail and walked off in a huff. The terrier stood a moment, and then, seeming to recognize that he was at fault, picked up the whip, and making after the aggrieved one, laid the whip down before him with every canine expression of goodwill. The maneuver was repeated two or three times, until the other dog understood that his playmate was sincere in his offer, made a dash at the whip, and the two dogs resumed their play, the best of friends. The repentance of the prodigal son was nothing in comparison with this display of the Irish terrier, which unfortunately was killed at Montrose station the day after the occurrence of the incident.—
London Star.

In Othello Shakespeare writes:
Oh, thou invisible spirit of wine—if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee—devil!

And again:
Oh, that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains.

Milton wrote:
Some by violent stroke shall die,
By fire, flood, famine, by intemperance more.
Plato laid down a rule that boys must not taste wine until they were eighteen years of age.

Notice to Voters.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN TO ALL PARTIES interested, that at a regular meeting of the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento county, California, held on the 16th day of July, 1890, an order was duly made and entered, cancelling the Great Register of said county, and ordering a re-registration of the voters thereof. Said order was made pursuant to Sec. 1094 of the Political Code, and all persons desiring to vote at the next ensuing general election are notified that they will have to be re-registered, as provided in said section and in conformity with this order.

Attest: W. B. HAMILTON,
(Seal) Clerk of Board of Supervisors, Sacramento County, California. aug2

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAmento—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California: to JOHN M.
RICHARD, Greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the Clerk's office of said Court, on the 18th day of July, 1890, in which action Mary J. Richard is plaintiff
and you are defendant.

That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of the Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony
now existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, and to award the care, custody and education of their child, Marguerite, to the plaintiff, and allowing the plaintiff to resume her maiden name, and for costs of suit, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service,
if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service,
if served elsewhere; and you are further notified that unless you so appear and answer within the time above specified, the plaintiff will ask for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 18th day of July,
A. D. 1890.

WM. B. HAMILTON, Clerk.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, COUNTY OF SACRAmento—ss. In the Superior Court in and for said county.

The People of the State of California, to J. H. Cog-
hill and A. J. Coghill, greeting:

You are hereby notified, that an action was commenced in the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, State aforesaid, by filing a complaint in the clerk's office of said Court, on the second day of August, 1890, in which action John Kuey is plaintiff and you are defendants. That the general nature of the action, as appears from said complaint, is as follows: To obtain a decree of this Court, quieting title of plaintiff to the south 110 feet of Lot No. 5, and the south 110 feet of the east quarter of Lot 6, block bounded by D and E, and 6th and 7th Streets, in the City of Sacramento, County of Sacramento, State of California, and directing defendants to appear and set forth their title, if any they have to said premises, and that defendants, and each of them, be forever
debarred from asserting any claim thereto, all of which is fully set forth in the complaint on file herein, reference to which is hereby made, and you are hereby directed to appear and answer said complaint
within ten days from the service of this writ, exclusive of the day of service, if served on you in said County of Sacramento; and within thirty days, exclusive of the day of service, if served elsewhere;
and you are further notified that unless you so
appear and answer within the time above specified,
the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief prayed for in the complaint.

In witness whereof, I, Wm. B. Hamilton, Clerk of the Court aforesaid, do hereunto set my hand and affix the seal of said Court, this 2d day of August,
A. D., 1890.

MATT. F. JOHNSON,
Attorney for Plaintiff. aug16—9t.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY
of Sacramento, State of California. In the matter of J. D. Bennett, an Insolvent Debtor.

J. D. Bennett having filed in this Court, his petition, schedule and inventory in insolvency, by which appears that he is an insolvent debtor, the said J. D.
Bennett is hereby declared to be insolvent.

The Sheriff of the County of Sacramento is hereby directed to take possession of all the estate real and personal of the said J. D. Bennett, debtor, except such as may be by law exempt from execution, and of all his deeds, vouchers, books of account, and papers, and to keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee of his estate. All persons are forbidden to pay any debts to the said insolvent, or to deliver any property belonging to him or to any person, firm or corporation or association, for his use. The said debtor is hereby forbidden to transfer or deliver any property until the further order of this Court, except as herein ordered.

It is further ordered that all the creditors of said debtor be and appear before the Honorable Judge of the Superior Court, of the County of Sacramento, in open Court, at the Court Room of said Court, on the 17th day of October, 1890, at 1:30 o'clock P. M., of that day to prove their debts, choose one or more assignees of the estate of said debtor.

It is further ordered that the order be published in this newspaper of general circulation published in the County of Sacramento, as often as the said paper is published before the said day set for the meeting of the creditors.

And it is further ordered that in the meantime all proceedings against the said insolvent be stayed.

Dated Sept. 1st 1890.

Did Not Reciprocate.

It has often been stated as a curious fact that Japanese women don't know how to kiss, and on this point a retired navy officer tells a Chicago Post reporter of an experience had some thirty years ago with a charming Japanese girl with whom he had become quite smitten. He says: "It was a night that would have spurred the most timid lover to action; and inside an hour's quarter I had my olive-complexioned fairy waist encircled and her head resting lightly on my shoulder. Then, Boswell, I kissed her. Who wouldn't? You're right sir. No one but a blind man whose time on this planet was long overrun. But she didn't return my chaste salute. She just nestled a little closer to me, that's all. At last I got tired of making all the demonstration. I wanted her to do her share. But as she seemed unlikely to do it unasked, why, I suggested the propriety of her helping me out. She asked me what for! That's what she did, Boswell! Asked me what for! I inquired if she didn't like it. She didn't know. Then I inquired if she disliked it. She didn't know. She had never had anyone do it before and had never tried to kiss anyone herself. I told her to try it once for luck. But she said she couldn't. Boswell, you could have knocked me down with a feather. However, I recovered myself and tried to teach her. She was a willing pupil, but beyond getting her to pucker her lips, I couldn't make her go. The kiss was beyond her. She would blow through her lips or draw in a good-sized breath. But kiss she could not. Well, Boswell, I am not one to give up without a struggle. And I was not then. So I taught and taught and taught, but it was no use. She just couldn't, that's all. And at last recognizing that fate was against me I gave it up, and till I left the island I was a changed man. I had in me the furnaces of a dozen Romeos, but a man, though twice so well equipped, cannot make love to an unresponsive piece of flesh. No more could I. Since then, Boswell, I have listened to each song sung in praise of beautiful Japan with a smile of pity for the ignorance of the singer."

Rabbi Hirsch, in an eloquent speech before the Chicago B'nai B'rith, counsels the training of Hebrew immigrants from Europe in American agriculture. Why not? The earliest Mosaic records prove that the Jewish race obtained its original supremacy through the tilling of the soil.

A sea-serpent, 103 feet long, was seen to coil itself up in slippery folds on the coast of Florida last month. Three reliable persons saw this creature distinctly.

Reader, the above is a "yarn." If people would believe the following truthful statement as readily as they swallow sea-serpent stories, it would be the means of saving thousands of lives. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, if taken in time and given a fair trial, will actually cure consumption of the lungs, which is really a scrofulous disease. If this wonderful medicine does not do all we recommend, when taken as directed, we will cheerfully and promptly return all money paid for it. Can any offer be more generous or fair? No other medicine possesses sufficient power over that fatal malady—Consumption, to warrant its manufacturers in selling it under such trying conditions. The "Golden Medical Discovery" is not only the most wonderful alternative, or blood-cleanser, known to medical science, but also possesses superior nutritive and tonic, or strength-giving properties, which assist the food to digest and become assimilated, thus building up both strength and flesh. For all cases of Bronchial, Throat and Lung Diseases, accompanied with lingering coughs, it is absolutely unequalled as a remedy. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, and kindred affections, it surpasses all other medicines.

$500 REWARD

is offered by the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for a case of Catarrh in the Head which they cannot cure. By its mild, soothing, and healing properties, Dr. Sage's Remedy cures the worst cases, no matter how bad, or of how long standing. Fifty cents, by druggists.

The Way English Girls Dress.

Have you heard that bright military scarlet is to play an important part in autumn and winter dress? It goes well with all shades of brown, so, perhaps, it is true; but, on the other hand, it is so hard a tint as to be extremely trying to the complexion. I see by my Paris paper that palest pinks, blues, lemons and greens, are in vogue for evening dresses in the vie de chateau. You would be amused at the comments of the London correspondents on the way English girls are dressing. He appears to take the jockey caps that some extraordinary women wear at the seaside as the orthodox garb of English girls and prophesies that before long they will adopt the helmet of the ancients. "They are wearing," he adds, "shirts like those of men, without any jackets and with light-colored skirts gathered in at the waist. In this simple apparel the greater part of the young misses have the appearance of having forgotten to dress themselves." And yet he hesitates to pronounce "le shoking," because in England everything is a matter of habit.—London Truth.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

It is a matter of congratulation that the State campaign is approaching the close—perhaps the only ones who regret its near termination are those who have taken advantage of its pendency to wash their dirty linen and offend the public by the bespatterment of filthy suds. We stated last week that an agreement, such as had been made in previous campaigns, had been entered into at the beginning of this one between the Chairmen of the Republican and Democratic County Central Committees, that resort would not be made to personalities, and that the people would not be offended by unjust and indecent attacks against candidates or persons officially concerned in party business management. We will repeat that from neither of the parties has slime flown; they have respected themselves and the people.

An element, however, developed in the campaign that has not regarded the amenities accorded by gentlemen in political as well as business affairs, and so nearly as we have been able to understand it was brought into being by a very few gentlemen, who through it sought to place themselves in the position of political dictators in the county; at whose feet men aspiring for office would be compelled to abjectly kneel. We printed last week what had been anonymously published in the advertising columns of the Record-Union by the "Citizens" concerning the writer, who occupies the position of Chairman of the Republican County Central Committee. It was but a sample of the slush that has been thrown out by the mud mill that has been established here. When that particular article appeared we took occasion to call the attention of a number of gentlemen whose names are carried on the "declaration of principles" to it, and asked them if they endorsed such a course of attack. We were told by those we met that they had been deceived; that they had been approached and asked if they believed in good government and pure politics; that they replied naturally "Yes," and signed the declaration, but had no idea it was the design to attack the action of the 223 delegates who sat in the Republican Convention. Regret was expressed that gross and unjust anonymous attacks were being made upon citizens of recognized integrity. Among others we spoke to on the subject was S. E. Carrington, from whose printing office an anonymous circular is being issued, and we asked him if he was the author or knew who wrote the matters that appeared in his circular and in the advertising columns of the Record-Union. He replied that he did not write them nor did he know who did. As Mr. Carrington is a minister of the gospel perhaps we must be compelled to assume that he told us the truth. We know, however, that he has assumed the boss-ship largely of the side-show, and that he has worn out many of our improved sidewalks in his tireless march to interview his scattered squad.

We do not, in this journal, speak of men personally. In this instance, however, in the coarse attack that was made upon us, our name was freely used, and the name of no individual was signed to the article. We do not hesitate to do the man who wrote it justice—to denounce him as an infamous coward. What we speak or write we stand responsible for, and if anyone feels inclined to ascertain who the particular individual is who has written any line printed in THEMIS, he will have no difficulty in finding out; if injustice has been done ample reparation will be made; we are therefore careful what we write. This attack upon us was gratuitous, and not prompted by any motive of fairness. It was general and calculated to wound without affording the assailed an opportunity for reply or defense. In our life we have suffered much from unjust assaults and from the wrongful acts of others, but have borne them in silence. Time has passed, however, when we will not resent. Did matters of this kind affect ourselves alone we would, perhaps, treat them with indifference, but there are others concerned who feel and for whose feelings we have respect. We have a mother advanced in years, and while the rough bark of manhood has grown upon us, we are yet her boy, and are sensible that the eyes of one glisten with pride when words of praise are uttered concerning us, and to whom despondency comes when words of disparity of us fall from tongue or pen. Again, it is that the position of Chairman of a political body is beset with sufficient harassment, and the person filling that office should not be compelled to perform his duty under the smart of indignity and injustice—particularly when it comes with the implied sanction of gentlemen of standing. If the parties who are contributing the money for the publication of the advertisements in the Record-Union will be just, let them publish the name of the individual who wrote this attack, that the people may know the identity of the creature. If his name will be printed we will rest the matter with no defense, and will trust to the judgment of a people among whom our life has been spent, and from whose hands we have received public consideration for which we are profoundly grateful.

The demonstration in honor of Senator Stanford on Thursday night was grand and imposing. Partisan character had been discarded, and it was an outpouring of devoted friends. The Senator gave a brief account of the legislation in Congress, and of the effect of the recent acts relating to protection. When he referred to his old home in this city, it was plain to be noticed that he was emotionally affected. At the conclusion of his remarks, Hon. Thomas Fitch delivered a masterly address. His apostrophy to labor was sublimely eloquent, and his tribute to the life labors of Senator Stanford could not be surpassed in force and magnetic eloquence. Mr. Fitch is the survivor of that trio of great actors—Baker, Edgerton, Fitch. The vast audience were held in the closest attention for nearly two hours. It was applauded to the echo. It is safe to assume that there will be few votes cast in this city that will militate against Stanford, unless through the vilest treachery. Had the people a vote direct, it would be a unit for our Senator.

The infamous forgeries, which have been so widely circulated against Mr. Markham, have been ventilated and proved to be such. Now, will our Democratic newspapers undo the injury they have wrought in circulating them? There is nothing so contemptible as this system of falsehood and villainy resorted to by desperate partisans. Fortunately the people cannot be readily deceived by these wholesale evidences of scoundrelism.

Concerning the attacks made by the mud bureau upon George G. Davis, the Republican nominee for Police Judge of this city, we spoke last week, but it is as well they should again be referred to. Mr. Davis rendered a written opinion, when Justice of the Peace, in the case of a person charged with violation of the election law, that was carefully prepared, and before rendition, had been submitted to and approved by some of the ablest members of the bar here. It seems, however, it did not meet with the views of some journalistic imbecile, who passed upon the case and the decision without having heard the evidence or reviewed the law, and the decision of the Justice was denounced on general principles. We perhaps will not tell an intelligent people that which they do not already know, when we say that in very many instances the judgment of men who write for newspapers is valueless—not that the fault is theirs, but they are not built in a way that can be fair and cannot appreciate what common sense is. If public justice was to be administered in accordance with the published expressions of many journalists, our Courts would become subjects for ridicule. In this instance, the decision of Judge Davis will be supported by any intelligent lawyer, and the person who wrote the cards about it is fully justified in writing anonymously, else he would write himself a bigot and ignoramus.

An indefinite charge has been published that fraudulent registrations have been made—rather a severe reflection on the County Clerk and his deputies to register. We have heretofore had occasion to save Mr. Hamilton from the assaults of his friends, and in this instance will say that the insinuation that he or Mr. Shepherd or Mr. Cravens permitted any doubtful registration to be enrolled, is uncalled for and unjust. The names were scrutinized by representatives of the Republican and Democratic parties, as well as by the gentlemen named in the Clerk's office, and of course the Register will be carefully scanned after printed. As a matter of fact it is within our knowledge that advance copies of the printed registers for Folsom and the precincts thereabouts have been furnished a week ago to representatives of the political parties, and we know that every accommodation has been extended to the political committees by the Clerk's office, with the object that a full and complete registration of the voters of the county should be had. It is ridiculous to charge that the candidates, committeemen, and officers in the County Clerk's office, have been or will be so stupid as to submit to disadvantage from fraudulent registrations, when the precise identification and residence of each voter is given. If there is anything wrong with the Register, let the Mugwumps rest assured that the representatives of the two parties, and Mr. Hamilton and his friends—three opposing interests—will discover it, and the howl of wolf need not go out until there appears at least a hair of the animal.

The campaign is not without its amusing features. The circular of the Mugwumps is enthusiastic in its praise of C. W. Baker, candidate for Justice of the Peace. They declare that Baker is a Republican, but flies off when it comes to municipal matters. Particularly when Baker was a Republican except when he was a candidate of that party for an office, cannot be established. He was appointed to the first official position he held here by a Democratic Police Judge, and we recollect there was considerable astonishment when he came before a Republican convention two years ago, took a nomination for Justice of the Peace, and declared that he had always been a Republican, though another inference could have been drawn from his associations. Why, at the recent Republican County Convention he appeared as a candidate, mounted the stage before the delegates, asked for their support, declared that he was a Republican, gave his adherence to the platform, and pledged himself to support the ticket from top to bottom. Possibly if the convention had given him the nomination, he would have declined the favor from the hands of the 223 bad men who composed the body. He asked for it all the same, and had he received it would doubtless have felt indignant against any defeated candidate who would show the bad faith to fight him.

This will be our last issue before the great political battle next Tuesday. The issues have been clearly defined. The Republican party has laid down its principles in a most decided and comprehensive manner. It has championed the cause of a protective tariff without any qualifications. All the promises made the people have been redeemed. All the good legislation for the nation is due the Republican Congress, even amid the most gigantic obstruction of the Democracy. All good legislation has been opposed by Democrats. Every Republican Congressman from the State voted for the great measures—the silver bill, the tariff act, the eight-hour law, the laws to protect the farmers against invidious trusts. Every Democrat voted against the important legislation. They voted against the protection of our State industries and productions—raisins, barley, grapes, wine, prunes, figs, silver, and everything which goes to make us rich and great. Every man on the Democratic ticket is pledged to undo all this beneficent legislation in the event of their success. This party of anti-progress is inimical to all the advanced ideas and acts of our Republican Congress. It is a party of tricks and deception. With no advanced ideas of its own, it seeks to destroy the work of those who have always had a fostering care of the nation. It would be little less than a crime to defeat our Republican Congressmen. It would be a blow at the enterprise and industry of the State. There is no possible reason for the Republicans to desert the party nominations. Personal considerations regarding candidates must not enter into the contest. Every man on the Republican ticket, from Governor down is committed to the industries of this State and the nation. The Democracy are pledged against all these and by poor sophistries seek to delude the unthinking into the belief that these advanced ideas are detrimental to our welfare. When these sophistries do not answer they resort to wilful and deliberate untruths. This is a time to stand by the old guard. There is safety only in protection to our industries.

The death of Bruce B. Lee is announced as having occurred at Red Bluff on Thursday. The deceased was a son of Barton Lee, an early banker and merchant in this city, and a member of the pioneer firm of Priest, Lee & Co. Bruce B. Lee represented this county in the Legislature one session, and during Governor Irwin's term was a member of the Board of Harbor Commissioners. Of late years he resided in Red Bluff and engaged in the insurance business.

Senator Sherman, at Pittsburg last week, said some excellent things, and which apply directly to the political situation in this county, as well as to the communities he was addressing. Says the Senator:

There can really be but two great parties. There are sometimes people who think they are a little better than their neighbors, go off to roost by themselves on some side issue, and call themselves a third party. I have had more experience in political life than some of my hearers, and I never saw any good come out of a third party. We are all Republicans, or all Democrats, in the general meaning of the term, because we are all in favor of a form of government in which all powers rest with the people. Therefore, these names do not signify anything. We must judge of the parties precisely as we would judge of the men. Of the two parties that now stand before the people of the country, one is like Heaven and the other like hades.

This fits those gentlemen who are seeking to aid the Democrats in securing a United States Senator by defeating some of the Republican nominees for the Legislature. The same might be urged with regard to Congressional candidates. When there was no distribution of patronage, there was no complaint against Congressman Morrow or McKenna, but as soon as we succeeded in wresting the Administration from the Democracy there was a wild clamor for Federal patronage. Every fellow who had taken part in the campaign demanded recognition for an office. The members of Congress were besieged with applications. When it developed that the Congressmen could not secure positions for each importunate candidate there was a howl against him. Nothing was too bad to say and dire vengeance was threatened. Mr. Morrow was defeated for a nomination for Governor by reason of the opposition of unrecognized aspirants for Federal positions. McKenna's only antagonism at this time comes from those whom he could not secure position. Do these people ever think that they can gain nothing by sending political opponents to Congress? If they do, it must occur to them that any opposition to our regular nominees is the meanest of all classes of revenge, for imaginary wrongs. Senator Sherman again hits the nail squarely on the head when he says:

In 1888 the people of the United States trusted the Republicans with their political power. Now the first power was the power to appoint the officers of this great Government of ours; and that power, instead of being a strength to any party, is a weakness, and upon that basis nearly all public men who fall in public life by the wayside fall by the exercise of patronage.

I say to you now, if I had power I would not allow a member of Congress to recommend any man for any office whatever. I would take from your political agents all the power that is invested in them by common custom, not by law. I would take from them all that power, and I would not even allow the members of Congress to recommend Postmasters, because it is an element of weakness.

The patronage is detrimental to our Congressmen.

The papers are saying that man's inhumanity to man was strongly illustrated by Governor Sprague, of Rhode Island, the other day, when at the funeral of Willie Sprague, who committed suicide at Seattle, the ex-Governor would not permit his divorced wife, Kate Chase Sprague, to look upon the face of her dead son. One paper says in addition, and says it with unbecoming rancor, "The old hog remained obdurate to the end." Not so fast, friends. Do you know the antecedent facts that lie close to and canker that now apparently callous heart? Do ye, oh, censors, remember the glorious, the fascinating, the all-conquering Kate Chase—daughter of Governor Chase, of Ohio; U. S. Senator Chase; Secretary of the Treasury Chase; Chief Justice of the nation Chase? Kate Chase, the beautiful, at whose feet nabobs and heroes of all climes worshiped, and who spurned them all for the gallant, the heroic, the millionaire Apollo, the war Governor of Rhode Island, and later U. S. Senator from that State, who wooed and won her when in the zenith of his popularity in the upper house of the nation's congress? William Sprague was the envied of all the gallants of the first sessions he spent at the capital; the envy of those whose wooings had been rejected by that princess of American beauties who thronged Washington, and whose attainments of head and heart had brought nobility to her feet; whose powers of fascination have not been equaled by American women; whose gift of converse compassed the catalogue of topics from the philosophy of government in all its myriads of forms since the ordination of society, even to that small talk so preferred by the shallow beau of the day with which Washington is often filled during the gay winter sessions; for Kate Chase could never offend; her heart was too good, and all, the learned and wise, the pitiful chump and adle-brained fop alike, found a friend in the Secretary's daughter. But her charms of manner and her mental attainments were too universal to permit her to settle to the realities of married life, and then it was that began her unhappy fate. United to a man of most jealous nature, one who worshiped her, he could brook no other attentions to her than those he gave. Yet she was easily flattered, and demanded from her liege lord that same freedom of action she had ever enjoyed before she joined her life to his; nor were there wanting those who were disposed to lend her aid in her rebellion against the little war Governor of Rhode Island. Roscoe Conkling, the lordly New York Senator, had then reached the height of his grandeur on the Senate floor as an orator, a statesman, a patriot. He and Blaine, antagonistic in all measures, as if through personal spleen, commanded more attention than any other two men in public life, and the bare announcement that either was to address the Senate sufficed to throng the galleries. It was in those days that Kate Chase Sprague preferred the society of the great New Yorker to that of her husband or home. National scandals arose from her conduct, but she seemed to scorn public opinion and defied criticism. The finer nature of Senator Sprague was assailed, and he, with unusual devotion to her good name, permitted her a divorce without remonstrance, when opinion seemed to deem him the real plaintiff. But their lives were blighted; he grew reckless, she miserable, and both recluses from public concern. Senator Conkling died, and he left a spot on his career that had better never been there—it was that that allied the now mourning mother's name with his own when he was making national history and when he was writing his name high up on the pinnacle of fame among those of other famous men; but his gallantry outstripped his love of glory. Let us not marvel that Governor Sprague should appear bitter at the grave of his dead boy, brought there, mayhap, by a sad knowledge of his mother's worship at a forbidden shrine.

PUTTING BABY TO SLEEP.

Did you ever try to get a baby to sleep? Not an ordinary, phlegmatic, spiritless baby that will fasten itself to the perforated end of a rubber cap slipped over a quart bottle of milk and vulgarly gorge itself into a gluttonish snooze, but a real, lively, rollicking rascal of a baby who doesn't intend snoozing away any more of his valuable time than he has to.

There have been evenings, I dare say, when the pleasure of putting baby to sleep has been yours. Your wife has had a sick headache or she has wanted to "run over to mother's" or into one of the neighbor's houses for something, and you have said, "Oh, no, of course not," when she has asked if you would mind getting baby to sleep after she had undressed him.

Perhaps, if it is a first experience, you are rather glad of a chance to convince your wife that she has fallen into the habit of wasting a good deal of time in getting that youngster to sleep evenings. You have always felt and said that you could get him to sleep in a fourth of the time your wife spends. All is required is a little firmness. The baby simply wants to be made to understand that it is bedtime and that he must go to sleep. That is your theory, and now you'll put it into practice, particularly as there is a long editorial in the evening paper and an article in the magazine you brought home with you that you want to read this evening.

Well, mamma departs, and you take baby, robed in his little white "nighty"—the nearest thing to an angel there is on earth, no matter how he may cut up and tear around in the hour to come.

You pick him up and say, fondly, but firmly:

"Now, papa's little baby boy must go right to sleep."

"Goo, goo," he says, which is his way of saying "good night," and also his way of saying forty other things.

"Now, baby, shut his little eyes," you say as you cuddle him up in your arms.

"Goo, goo," he says, with his eyes wide open and a sort of imitation in them that he will shut them when he gets ready to do so, and not before.

"Baby," you say a little more severely, "papa wants to read his paper, and baby must go to sleep."

If ever a baby said "I won't do it" with his heels, yours says it about this time, for the way he lets his little pink heels fly into the air means nothing less than a distinct and positive, "I won't."

You then hold him firmly in your arms and he begins to squirm. He writhes and wriggles with unexpected strength and pluckily contends for freedom, until you let him go through sheer admiration of his grit.

"Goo, goo," he says, which this time means "Ah, ha! I'll show you a thing or two."

"Baby, dear," you say plaintively, "won't papa's baby go to sleep now?—that's a good baby."

Then the good baby manifests his intention of getting down and crawling all over the floor. Foiled in this, he concludes to crawl all over you. His little fingers clutch your beard and you haven't the heart to shake him off, not even when he pulls so hard that your eyes are full of tears. Then he pokes his fingers into your nose, eyes and ears, giving the result of his investigations in a series of gurgling "goo-goos," indicating that he is as wide awake as he ever was in his life, and he thinks he can hold out three or four hours yet. You haul him down into your arms and say:

"Now, if baby don't go right to sleep papa will have to whip. Shall papa whip baby?"

The "goo-goo" he now screeches out means, "Do so at your own risk." Whip him! There is more or less of the brute in every man, but you inwardly thank God that your brutal tendencies don't run in the direction of pounding babies. If they did your wife is deserving of a divorce free of charge and everything you have on earth as alimony.

You simply cuddle him up in your arms and begin rocking him to and fro in such a manner that he couldn't go to sleep if he wanted to, no more than you could if lashed to a trip-hammer. Then you sing everything you know, from "Rock of Ages" down to "Annie Rooney," all in one key, for ten to one, you can't say a note correctly to save your life.

This concert lasts an hour and a half and baby lives through it all and has vitality enough to pop up at the close of it with a cheery:

"Ya, ya! Goo, goo?"

Then, you shake him a little and say:

"Now, young man, I've had just about enough of this. You've simply got to go to sleep! Go to sleep!"

Now you've made him cry. He slips limply down into your arms and opens his mouth in one prolonged yell, followed by another and another until he has emitted about a thousand of them. You walk the floor with him; you jounce him up and down; you coax and weddle, and scold and fume, and, I dare say, swear a little.

By and by his cries grow weaker and fewer; you feel his little form relaxing in your arms, his little limbs hang limply, his curly head lies heavily on your shoulder, his eyelids droop slowly, and, with the most pitiful of sounds—the sobbing of a child in its sleep—the little fellow wanders into dreamland. You are free to lay him down now and take up your book or paper, but you don't always do it. Sometimes you simply sit down gently with the baby still in your arms and your eyes fixed on his flushed little face. You are sorry you you made him cry. Every one of these sleeping sobs go right to your heart.

There you sit for an hour, maybe, looking into his face with a sort of divine tenderness in your heart that makes the troublesome little bit of humanity in your arms a treasure for which you would lay down your life.

P. S.—I forgot to say that after you have very carefully laid him down and crawled away from his cradle on your hands and knees so as not to awaken him, you are paralyzed by a loud and distinct, "Ya! ya! ya!" and you have it all to do over again. —J. L. Harbour in Detroit Free Press.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

Waiter—"Soup, sir?" Thespian—"No; confound your impudence! I'm a star."

W. M. Wilkinson proposes to fit Jeffrey Lewis out with a play next season and star her.

A new play is called A Barrel of Money. It will be produced on the stage and not in the box office.

"I'm going to write a farce called The Summer Girl." "I wouldn't. You never can get a long engagement."

The big spectacle Nero, now at Niblo's, in New York, is a success. It will be retained there for the whole winter.

Mr. and Mrs. P. T. Barnum, who have been spending some time in Denver, expect soon to visit California, and from there they will go to Japan.

The play which Ouida is writing for Sarah Bernhardt is to be called Helen of Toledo. Catille Mendes is also engaged upon a drama for the tragedienne.

Campanini has written an article on how to train the voice. He should also write on how to train the patience while some other people are training their voices.

Mrs. Alice Shaw, the American whistler, has signed a contract with Patti's Russian impresario, to give exhibitions in Russia, Roumania, Austria, Germany and France, beginning in St. Petersburg next month.

New Lamps for Old, at Daly's, Sunset at the Garden Theatre, and The Maister of Woodbarrow at the Lyceum, would seem to indicate that Jerome K. Jerome is fast becoming a dramatic fad in the metropolis.

The Soudan, at the Boston Theatre, Boston, is among the big theatrical winners of the year. It remains in the city of culture for twenty-seven weeks, which will be the longest run ever accorded a play in that city.

The crowds which flock to the big New York Academy every Sunday evening to hear the Rev. Dr. Talmage discourse are not less large than the multitudes which assemble in the theatre during the week to see Denman Thompson in The Old Homestead.

"Little Charlie" Frohman inaugurated his new stock company at the Twenty-third Street Theatre, New York, Tuesday, October 21st. This youngest Frohman is possessed of the most energy of all the brothers. "Only four feet high and a six and three-quarter hat"—but results speak.

The most thoroughly "worked" theatre in America, from a newspaper standpoint, is the Academy in New York. Every week news concerning this play-house, and the other enterprises of its managers, is sent to every newspaper in every town in America and England of fifteen thousand inhabitants and over.

Wilson Barrett's three charming daughters have gone into trade. That is, they have opened a large millinery establishment at Hempstead, near London. Their mother died some years ago, and the girls find home life dull during their father's absence. So they have very sensibly set to work to help keep themselves.

A serpent bracelet on a lady's wrist had a solemnifying effect on a florid man of full habit at a theatre the other night. The man had twice been out between the acts, and had just squeezed back in a style that threatened to brush the lady's knee-caps off, when he saw the serpent. He gave it a sudden stare for an instant, and almost turned pale; then he chuckled: "I knew two punches couldn't take hold of a man like that!"

Just at present there is a great dearth of vaudeville performers in this country. Four years ago the market was flooded, but within the past few years the public demand for farcical productions has been so great that the vaudeville field has been drained to supply the specialties of which that class of entertainment so largely consists. Variety performers who could not command more than twenty-five dollars a week three years ago now easily secure twice that figure.

Besides an inherent, open-handed generosity, Denman Thompson, the "Uncle Joshua" of the original Old Homestead, at the Academy, New York, is noted for his tenderness to members of the brute kingdom. He has been known repeatedly to have followed some overburdened or crippled horse for hours to have its owner punished for inhumanity. Two instances of this kind in one day, with the genial actor as complainant, are to be found on the police blotters of New York City.

Here is the style in which the advance agent of a burlesque troupe announces his wares in a Western town: Tropical loveliness in most lavish profusion. thirty olive-hued nightingales in sweet and soulful songs, artistic poses, lovely costumes, fairy-like forms. The greatest stellar attraction seen since Hiparchus numbered the stars. A shower of loveliness from a cornucopia full of splendors. All the glories and beauties of the tropics under the mottled mantle of hilarious burlesque.

The extensive structure, Nillsson Hall, adjoining the big Academy, New York, has been purchased by Messrs. Gilmore & Thompson, the owners of the Academy. They propose to use the site to enlarge the scope of the Academy's stage, making it the largest in the world, with a depth of 101 feet and a width of 226½ feet, for coming years of the Old Homestead. The business for the first fortnight of the fourth year has been equal to the prosperity won by the play in former seasons.

New York has had many notable productions and Niblo's has been the scene of numerous rare spectacular displays, but nothing like the artistic finish and tasteful spectacular elaboration bestowed on the presentation of the new dramatic pageant, Claudius Nero, as presented at Niblo's, Monday night, has ever been held within the walls of a New York play-house within the history of metropolitan theatricals. Eckstein's romance, Nero, has furnished Max Freeman with a thrilling stage tale of the Nero epoch, and Messrs. Locke & Davis have mounted it sumptuously and in a manner that will give the popular amusement projectors a prestige here second to none. The advance sale for the first week of Claudius Nero surpasses that of any attraction ever staged at Niblo's, not even excepting the hitherto unapproachable record of the original Black Crook. What with the power of its story, the splendor of its surroundings and marvelous manœuvring of the large bodies of people engaged in the spectacular drama, together with the wild beast exhibition in the arena scene, Claudius Nero's reign in the big city will be a prosperous and memorable one.

No member of the American House of Representatives seems to be aware that, under the common law of England—which the colonists in their dependent state regarded as their birthright, and which American jurists, since the colonists became independent of the mother country, style the inheritance of American citizens—copyright in printed books or in unpublished manuscripts is perpetual. Till the statute of Anne there was no limit to the term of the author's enjoyment of the product of his brain, and his heirs or assigns could succeed to his privilege. This perpetual copyright still exists and is recognized in the case of letters in manuscript, and the person who has printed a letter without the formal permission of the writer or proprietor can be compelled by a Court of law to cease the publication.

In the case of a female thief arraigned in New York several days ago for the theft of a purse from one Mrs. Barrett, the Recorder held that if it had been taken from the lady's pocket it would have been grand larceny; but that if it had been picked up from the floor where its owner had dropped it in a futile struggle to put it in her pocket the offense would have been merely petty larceny. On learning that Mrs. Barrett was a dressmaker the Recorder instantly settled on the lower grade of offense, feeling morally certain that in the fabrication of her dress she had so constructed the pocket as to preclude the possibility of putting a purse in it within a reasonable time.

It has plainly stated, and it is now known, that some who claim to be Republicans, will endeavor to defeat the legislative nominees and degrade the Senator by losses here. The people, however, have the determination of the matter, and they are not likely to be deceived.

Phillips for Surveyor; that William Oeste will run for Road master in 1890; and that H. H. Slavens will be a candidate for Coroner in 1890. Brother Ellis should read his proofs more carefully, for it leaves an impression that some of the candidates are in the fight too late, while the candidate for Coroner is too previous.

Our American detectives are considered at times quite clever. One of the means of perpetuating the memory of criminals is by photographs. Now the Chinese cunning exceeds ours in this manner of identity. These Mongolian detectives never ely on the pictures of the face, but always use the hand as a means of preserving an accurate description. The hand, says the Celestial detective philosopher, can never change. No two persons can ever have the lines of the hand alike. The palm of the hand, therefore, is always taken by impression showing the lines. The thumb particularly is a certain evidence of detection, as no two persons have thumbs exactly alike. The face may be changed in a thousand different ways. Age changes the face, but no age can change the lines on the hand or thumb. Thus our heathen neighbors, in place of utilizing photography in perpetuating the memory of criminals, only take impressions of the lines of the hand and thumbs.

According to a census of Vassar College graduates recently published, it appears that of 867 young ladies whose career after quitting the institution had been learned, 315, or a little more than thirty-six per cent. had married. It would be most unjust to an honored alma mater, however, to rashly conclude from these statistics that the Vassar girl, by reason of her collegiate endowment, is in fact, or in the estimation of the male American, less eligible as a life partner. A little learning would be a dangerous thing, indeed, if it should prove a bar to the connubial prospects of those who have spent years in the acquisition of attainments designed to make them attractive in the social circle. The cheering fact is to be borne in mind, however, that the remaining sixty-four per cent. have plenty of time to marry yet. Happily, there is no statute of limitation in matrimony, as in ordinary debts; and, as the gifted Maria Mitchell once observed, "the Vassar girl marries late, but marries well."

Examine Your Election Ticket.

"Section 1. Section two of an Act entitled 'An Act to prevent the circulation of bogus election tickets, and to prevent frauds upon voters,' approved March 7, 1878, is amended so as to read as follows:

"Section 2. When such vignette and inscription have been adopted and proposed, an impression of the same, followed by the regular ticket of such party, printed so as to constitute a lawful election ballot, and sealed up in an envelope, may be filed with the County Clerk of the county at any time prior to ten days before the opening of the polls on election day. Such ballot shall be kept by said Clerk on deposit, and from the time of said filing it shall be unlawful for any person to imitate, copy, or in any manner counterfeit the same. Any person violating the foregoing provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction punished accordingly. And it shall be taken as the intent of any person or elector casting a ballot having such vignette and inscription, or such imitation, copy, or counterfeit thereof, to have cast the regular ticket of such party adopting and preparing said regular ticket, and the same shall be counted as the complete regular ticket, except as to names erased or inserted upon said ticket, if done in writing."

HON. DEMAS STRONG.

An Early Mayor of Sacramento—Floods and Riots of 1850—A Pioneer Election.

We received a visit this week from Hon. Demas Strong, of Brooklyn, New York, who is now on a visit to this coast with his daughters. Mr. Strong was elected a member of the first Common Council of this city early in 1850, and was President of that body at the time of the squatter riots in August, 1850. In January of that year the city was inundated and from that cause, and sickness, much suffering resulted. The city finances were at a low ebb, and on the 14th, Mr. Strong, then in mercantile business, sent the following communication to the Council:

"Allow me to congratulate you upon the success which has attended your indefatigable exertions to alleviate the sufferings and wants of those who, by the disastrous flood which now inundates our city, have been thrown upon your hands to be provided for. Personal examination, yesterday and to-day, satisfies me that nothing but the most strenuous and well directed endeavors on your part could have accomplished so much good. In addition to the tender already made of the free use of my rooms for the accommodation of families, allow me also to say that such articles of clothing, blankets, shoes, stockings, etc., as may in your opinion be needed, I shall be most happy to place at your disposal."

The thanks of the Council, under seal, were tendered to Mr. Strong. In the squatter riots referred to, the Mayor, Hardin Biglow, was shot from his horse, on Fourth street, and very badly wounded. Afterward he was seized with cholera, and died in San Francisco in November, 1850. From August, the time of the wounding of Biglow, until after his death, when his successor was elected, Mr. Strong acted as Mayor of the city, and it was during a critical period. As a matter of curiosity we reproduce the advertisement of one of the election tickets on which Mr. Strong ran, from the Transcript of March, 1850:

 RANCHEROS, TO THE RESCUE!—The enemy is in the field—our bills have been mutilated and in some instances destroyed; but let not your "angry passions rise" in consequence of the indignity. Imitate as far as in your power lies the example of your leaders. Keep cool, work hard and vote early. Remember that abuse and curses, like young chickens, "will come home to roost." When once the votes are in the ballot boxes, no appeal can be taken. HOMBRES.

RANCHO TICKET.

THROUGH BY DAYLIGHT.

For Mayor—Joseph Grant.
For City Recorder—B. F. Washington.
For Councilmen—T. McDowell, C. A. Tweed, Z. Hubbard, Charles O. Brewster, E. J. Feeney, D. Strong, Dr. J. F. Morse, Dr. James S. Martin, Charles H. Miller.
For City Marshal—M. D. Eyre.
For City Attorney—A. C. Monson.
For City Assessor—Wm. F. Prettyman.
For City Treasurer—Barton Lee.

RANCHO TICKET—FOR THE COUNTY.

"All's well that ends well."

For Clerk of the Supreme Court—E. H. Tharp.
For District Attorney—Wm. C. Wallace.
For County Judge—Edward J. Willis.
For County Clerk—Presley Dunlap.
For County Attorney—John H. McKune.
For County Surveyor—Andrew J. Binney.
For Sheriff—Jos. D. Magee (better known as Johnny Rancho).
For County Recorder—Thomas A. Warbass.
For County Assessor—D. W. Thorpe.
For Coroner—Henry F. Beadle.
For County Treasurer—Wm. Glaskin.

The election was held April 1, 1850. Three tickets were in the field, and canvassing progressed for several weeks both in the city and the county, and a number of circulars and handbills were issued. The polls remained open until late in the evening, and there were lively times around the ballot boxes. There was no rioting, but as an account published at the time says, "there was a great deal of superfluous gas ventilated and considerable whisky drunk." Thomas J. Henley and Hardin Biglow were the other candidates for Mayor. The whole number of votes polled for that office was 2,493, and Biglow had a majority over all others of 323. At the election the following city officers were elected, aside from the Mayor: Recorder, B. F. Washington; Marshal, N. C. Cunningham; Attorney, J. Neely Johnson; Assessor, J. W. Woodland; Treasurer, Barton Lee; Councilmen, Tweed, Dr. V. Spaulding, Strong, McDowell, J. McKenzie, Miller, J. R. Hardenbergh, Jesse Moore, A. P. Pettit. County officers—Treasurer, Glaskin; District Attorney, Wallace; County Attorney, McKune; Judge, Willis; Clerk, Dunlap; Recorder, L. A. Birdsall; Sheriff, J. McKinney; Surveyor, John G. Cleal; Assessor, Thorpe;

Coroner, P. F. Ewer; Clerk of the Supreme Court, Tharp. On the 4th of April, Mr. Strong was elected President of the Council.

It is interesting to note the persons whose names figure in this article. Mayor Biglow was a man of great executive ability and his messages to the Council indicate that he had a clear head. He was a man of bravery, and in the riots of 1850, rode undauntedly to almost certain death. Washington afterward filled prominent Federal offices, figured much in Democratic politics, was for a time editor of the State Journal here, and afterwards of the San Francisco Examiner. He filled the latter position at the time of his death. Tweed was afterward State Senator from Placer and a Justice of the Supreme Court of Arizona. He died in San Francisco a few years ago. Morse was the first editor of the Sacramento Union, was a prominent physician, and is dead. Monson was for several years Judge of the District Court and now lives in the East. Lee was a leading banker, and died here many years ago. Wallace was afterwards District and Superior Judge in Napa county, and is now practicing law at Auburn. Willis afterwards became a minister and moved to the East. Dunlap was a well known lawyer and his death here a few years ago was generally lamented. McKune is still in active law practice here, and to him THEMIS is indebted for many valuable articles. Henley was a prominent Democratic politician and lawyer, and was the father of ex-Congressman Barclay Henley. Johnson was elected Governor on the Know Nothing ticket in 1855, and died at Salt Lake. Woodland was shot and killed in the squatter riots in 1850. Hardenbergh was afterwards Postmaster here, and United States Surveyor General, and died several years ago. He also served two terms as Mayor. McKinney was but twenty-one years of age and in 1850 was shot and killed by the squatters near Brighton.

Mr. Strong expressed astonishment at the changes that had come over Sacramento. He left for the East in 1851, but returned to stump the State for Fremont in 1856. Since that year until now he remained in Brooklyn. For several years he was a member of the Board of Aldermen of that city, and also filled a seat in the State Senate of New York.

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street.

The Growth of Distrust.

Things are not what they seem. At least many things are not, especially money. A keen observer, who had been watching a coin handler, thus descants: He had a big pile of silver dollars and a comfortable package of bank notes under his fingers. He wasn't a bank cashier, but he handles large sums of money daily for all that. The man outside the counter stood ready to receive the cash. The man on the inside counted it. He first placed the bright coins in $5 piles. Then he spread them out in a white streak across the counter and fingered them into his palm, building up the blocks of five again. Once more he picked up the piles and closely eyed each Liberty-headed piece. He was looking for a plugged dollar. Then he passed them between finger and thumb. He was feeling for a counterfeit. Then a few suspicious ones were tested between his teeth. He was testing for a leaden fraud. Satisfied as to their genuineness, he shoved them over to the owner, who, after a formal inspection, placed them in his money bag. Then the man behind the counter went over the bills. Some he held before the light, others he turned over and over, still others he stretched between his hands and eyed closely. All the while he was searching for the bad among the good. Now is it really so bad as this? Is the world actually so wicked as to cause such close scrutiny of coin? Or was he just a bit too careful? Who knows? At all events there is suspicion and distrust in the minds of all the fellows who constantly come in contact with the sinews of the nation. They cannot trust to appearances. Things in the money line just now are not what they seem at all events.

Some women look as if they had been born clothed, some as if they had achieved clothing, namely, bought it ready-made, and others as if they had had their clothes thrust upon them. It is this difference in the manner of dressing, and not the difference in dollars and cents, that constitutes the wide variation there is in the appearance of women.

A Tariff Story.

A few days before the adjournment of Congress, says the Washington Post, Senators Plumb, Ingalls, Wilson of Iowa, Pierce, Casey, Moody, Pettigrew, Paddock, Davis and Powers, ten in all, met in caucus and solemnly resolved that they would never, never vote for the tariff bill so long as it imposed any duty on binding twine. When the bill came up for passage a little later only one of the ten voted against it, and when the final action—the adoption of the conference report—was taken, all but three of the ten voted for the bill, though it did not put binding twine on the free list.

After the close of the session Senator Edmunds, in leaving the chamber, fell in with two of the Senators who had thus "flunked," and, taking each by a lapel of his coat, told them the following story:

"Years ago I used to do my own marketing, and I traded with a very independent sort of German butcher. One morning I asked him why he always charged me eighteen cents for a certain kind of meat when the butcher down the street a little way charged only fifteen cents.

"Vell," said he "if he vill sell it to you for fifteen cent v'y you don't buy it of him, eh?"

"I explained that I had intended to buy it of him that morning, but he didn't happen to have any on hand just then.

"Oh, ho!" said my butcher. "Vell, you come around here sometimes ven I don't got any, and I will sell him to you for fifteen cents, too."

The listening Senators laughed rather heartily at the story. Then, after a moment of silence, Senator Edmunds added:

"You two gentlemen remind me of that butcher."

"How so?" they asked.

"Why, when there is no voting to do you vote against the bill."

The two Senators laughed again, but not quite so heartily.

A Socratic querist of the Bowery asked a half dozen men "What is the cheapest and best thing for a poor family to eat?" An Italian replied, "It is macaroni, as everybody knows." An Irishman answered "Sure, for certain, it is the potato." A Missourian said, "It is cornmeal." A Chinaman, "It is rice." A Scotchman, "It is oatmeal." A German, "It is sauerkraut." After getting these six views of half a dozen specialists, the Socratic inquirer put the question to a rustic Gaul, who at once replied, "It is polenta, as you can find out by trying it." The Socratic querist of the Bowery is now making preparations to put these varied opinions to a practical test.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On November 4th and 5th The Stowaway will be given at the Metropolitan. The company is reported to be superior to the one last presenting the melodrama in this city. It will be staged with fine effect.

The Still Alarm did an excellent business three days this week. The fire scene was great. Nothing finer on the stage. Every detail was perfect. The play without the trained horses and effects of this scene would amount to little.

Thursday night the famous Carlton's English Opera Company commenced an engagement with The Brigands. Although there was a great counter attraction in the reception of Senator Stanford and Thomas Fitch, there was a good house. It is sufficient to say that the Carlton Company is the most complete and artistic on the road. At each of his six engagements in this city Mr. Carlton has furnished us with the finest operatic entertainments we have received. Last night the rendition of that favorite opera Nanon was presented to a large and delighted audience. Carlton's Company this season includes Miss Clara Lane, Miss Clara Wisdom, Miss Jeannie Winston, J. K. Murray and C. A. Biglow. This afternoon The Brigands at the matinee. To-night Mikado.

The abominations in human conversation are many, but one has come out of late that is particularly tiresome. Whenever you say anything that agrees with the opinions of the person with whom you are talking he answers, "That's right." When anything is explained to him he says, "That's right." In fact, on the slightest opportunity he will say, "That's right." In every conversation of twenty minutes there will be fifty "That's rights." It would be just as well if he would occasionally say, "That's true," or "That's so," or "I think so, too," or "I agree with you," or even "Your'e mighty accurate." Anything would be better than the "naneous iteration" of "That's right." The new constitution cannot provide against such outrages, but every man with the good of his fellow citizens at heart can avoid using one expression incessantly.

Lady Hilda Dundas, the daughter of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is said to be an unusually lovely girl. She is slender and graceful, fair and girlish. She wears the simplest of gowns and the daintiest of costumes.

The Tongue.

"The boneless tongue, so small and weak,
Can crush and kill," declared the Greek.

"The tongue destroys a greater horde,"
The Turk asserts, "than does the sword."

The Persian proverb wisely saith,
"A lengthy tongue—an easy death."

Or sometimes takes this form instead:
"Don't let your tongue cut off your head."

"The tongue can speak a word whose speed,"
Says the Chinese, "outstrips the steed."

While Arab sages this impart:
"The tongue's great storehouse is the heart."

From Hebrew wit the maxim sprung, "Though feet should slip, ne'er let go the tongue."

The sacred writer crowns the whole,
"Who keeps his tongue doth keep his soul."

Proposed Reform in Church Dress.

A society has been started by some ladies of high social position in an uptown church for the "advancement of propriety and frugality in dress." It seems that the minister has an interest in the working girls and to improve her condition has asked with tearful eloquence that the devout dames and damsels in the congregation forego the display of all fashionable and fantastic finery, not only on Sunday, but the other six days as well. From all accounts it seems to be a grim and cheerless kind of organization that will hardly live the year out. The reverend gentleman has listed some of the frivolous and feminine fripperies which the sisters may not wear. Here they are: Ear-bobs, bangles, buckles, chatelaines, feathers, flowers, ribbons; useless trimmings, such as passementerie, fringes and ruffles; velvets, silks and embroidered stuffs; gaudy colors, costly fans, silver-handled umbrellas and sun-shades; silver or ivory-bound prayer books. He has positively forbidden his parishioners to carry lorgnettes and bonbonnières into church and stated his aversion to silver or beaded purses. The subject of décollete gowns and sleeveless bodices was dismissed with one word—"indecent." He horrified the good ladies by asking them "to wear cotton gloves instead of kid, as few shop girls in the parish can afford the luxury." This was too much, but the society compromised on a dark colored, two-buttoned kid glove without stitching. It remains to be seen what will become of this spasm of propriety and frugality in the name of that much abused and harmless class of society generally termed the working girl.

About five years ago a Chicago minister undertook just such a reform as this. An awful howl of protest went up from the Michigan avenue pewholders that was heard as far out as the present site of the World's Fair. The Doctor was firm. He made his wife and daughters march into church twice every Sunday as primly and severely attired as Priscilla and her mother. Mrs. Neverend is pretty and her daughters are lovely. The style suited them, for, to tell the truth, the doctor's salary was not large.

They were living at a private hotel at the time, and it was most convenient for them to find economy in dress obligatory. There was a great deal of pulpit pounding on the subject and no end of discussion among the silk stocking owners. The gallery portion of the congregation wore their straw hats in snow-time, and smiled beatifically. The elder sisters bought tailor made dresses at $1.50 each and all went merrily along in dull gray chevots. English tweeds and homespuns till Easter time. Then there was a sudden flash of spring bonnets, gay frocks and bright colors. Diamonds big as cherries bloomed in little ears. The doctor was disgusted, and since that Spring has never mentioned the subject of dress. It is all nonsense to attempt a suppression of pretty clothes. The desire to look nice is born in woman. If that blissful condition can be obtained from the so-called feminine fripperies she will adopt them and cling to them in spite of the pulpit, the press and perdition. Every few years the Dress Reform Society takes a new leaf of life and for a season or two bravely attacks the "foolish extravagance of dress." As a distinct encouragement of all that is ugly in shape, stuff and style, this organization is without a peer. The leg-lettes, the chimelons, the boneless corsets, the common sense calfskin boots and the quilt-like gowns have their time for appearing and disappearing. A little violence is done to taste while the session lasts, but the affair is not without its grotesque features and one can afford to pay liberally to laugh.

Count Taaffe, the Austrian Premier, is said to have offended Emperor William by his friendship for Bismarck. An official with such a name as that should display more diplomacy, a prominent feature of which is plenty of taffy.

The remnant of the Iroquois Indians living near Syracuse, N. Y., are going in strongly for temperance. If their grandfathers had done this years ago there would be more Iroquois Indians to-day.

TENTS, AWNINGS AND WINDOW SHADES.

Turned the Other Cheek.

"There are times," said Colonel Metcalf the other day, "when men will stand up before treatment, however outrageous. A man who has seen what it means to stand up before a revolver acquires a respect for that weapon when it is in another man's hands and he has the 'drop' on you. There was nothing in the old days in the seventies which demanded reparation so quickly and so definitely as an insult. For a man to accept an insult without demanding or taking redress was to bring upon himself the scorn of the entire community. And yet I accepted the worst kind of an insult once, and even to this day I blush when I think of the circumstances.

"I was in Hugo at the time, and was playing billiards when a man came in and began to make a disturbance. He was a well-known desperado, and no one was anxious to get into trouble with him. He became so obnoxious without being checked that finally he picked up one of the billiard balls and sent it flying through the window. He was just reaching for another when I reversed my cue, and placing the butt end of it in the pit of his stomach, pushed him back against the wall. The next moment I was looking in the barrel of a Colt's revolver. The sensation in such a case is simply overpowering. I was perfectly helpless, for I had no revolver myself and if I had been wearing one he could have killed me before my hand could have reached it. I thought he was going to shoot me then and there, but he chose not to do this from some whim.

"I'm going to slap your face, Metcalf," he said, "so that you can tell people about it. Turn your cheek around here."

"I looked way down the barrel of that six-shooter so far that it seemed to me that I could see a bullet in its chamber. I set my teeth against the insult. I knew that I was deadly pale.

"Turn it," he said. "One, two—" and I turned my cheek. I did not feel the blow, but the flame that scorched it afterward was like a furnace fire.

"Now," he said with a laugh, give me the other one." Again he counted—"one, two—" and I presented my other cheek for a slap.

"If ever I wanted to kill a man it was that fellow, but I had no show at all. I remember the sickening feeling which ran over me at the thought that he might insist upon breaking my nose. Revolver or no revolver, I do not believe I could have stood that. But I took the insults, not from him, but from a six-shooter. A man can't argue against a revolver. But for months and months I longed to meet that man on even terms. I never saw him again."—Nashville American.

KISSED ANOTHER MAN'S WIFE.

"You scoundrel," yelled young Jacob Green

At his good neighbor Brown,—

"You kissed my wife upon the street,—

I ought to knock you down."

"That's where you're wrong," good Brown replied,

In accents mild and meek;

"I kissed her; that I've not denied

But I kissed her on the cheek—and I did so because she looked so handsome—the very picture of beauty and health. What is the secret of it?"

"Well," replied Green, "since you ask it, I will tell you; she uses Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I accept your apology. Good night."

An unhealthy woman is rarely, if ever, beautiful. The peculiar diseases to which so many of the sex are subject, are prolific causes of pale, sallow faces, blotched with unsightly pimples, dull, lustreless eyes and emaciated forms. Women so afflicted can be permanently cured by using Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription; and with the restoration of health comes that beauty which, combined with good qualities of head and heart, makes women angels of loveliness.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. It is a positive specific for leucorrhea, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb.

Heart in the Wrong Place.

A man with his heart on the right side, and his internal arrangements generally wrong, fell under the knife of the doctors at the University of Pennsylvania a few days ago. Dr. Thomas C. Clark, while dissecting and demonstrating upon the body of a man, probably 50 years old, discovered a complete inversion of the abdominal and thoracic viscera, the peculiar nature of which is that the heart, instead of being on the left side, was found to be on the right, and the aorta, or great artery, instead of arching to the right, turned to the left.

Upon further examination it was found that the stomach and spleen were also on the right side, while the liver, instead of being on the right, was on the left side—a complete inversion of these organs.

Dr. Joseph Deidy, L.L. D., the eminent scientist and professor of anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania, visited the dissecting rooms and, after a thorough examination, said there was a complete transversion of the organs and a most wonderful anomaly. He stated that in all probability there was not a similar case in existence.

The cadaver was afterwards presented to the University and placed in the museum.—Philadelphia Record.

Biggest House on the Globe.

The Freihous (free house) in Wieden, a suburb of Vienna, is the most spacious building on the globe. Within its walls a whole city of human beings live and work, sleep and eat. It contains in all between 1,200 and 1,500 rooms, divided into upwards of 400 dwelling apartments of from four to six rooms each. This immense house has thirteen court-yards—five open and eight covered—and a large garden within its walls. A visitor to the building relates that he once spent two hours in looking for a man known to reside in the house.

Scarcely a trade, handiwork or profession can be named which is not represented in this enormous building.

The house has thirty-one staircases, and fronts on three streets and one square. In one day the postman's delivery has amounted to as many as 1,000 persons.

The present population of the house is 2112 persons.

A Sworn Circulation of One.

The paper with the smallest circulation in the world, probably, is the Chronicle, published each morning exclusively for the use of Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, at an annual cost of 200,000 guilders—about $100,000. It contains in condensed form all the articles in foreign papers which refer to Austria.

Mrs. Senator Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota, is a strong advocate of the practical in the education of girls. "I believe," she said, "that above everything else every girl, I care not what her circumstances in life may be, should be educated to earn her own living. In this country, where reverses of fortune are so sudden and so frequent, this must ever be the most important part of the education for the rich as well as the poor."

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

It is a matter of congratulation that the election is over. So far as the result in the East is concerned, we confess it to be a surprise to us. In this State, the majority for the general ticket is pronounced, and that could have reasonably been expected. In this county we are not disappointed, though we express regret at the defeat of some of the Republican candidates. We were in a position to judge very closely as to the result, and were satisfied, that from the fight made against a portion of the Republican ticket, there would be losses. While we believe there has been injustice done to some of the Republican candidates, yet it is the implied will of the people, and they are supreme. It is manifest that there was interjected into the local campaign much filth by a few, yet injustice to the majority of the gentlemen whose names were connected with the Independent movement, we will say it did not meet with their endorsement, and we much respect their declarations that they regretted it. However, it did happen that the determination of the judgment of this people was controlled in some instances by political mercenaries, and that matter is unfortunate. It is within our personal knowledge that money was corruptly used, and that it was handled by base men—they have admitted it to us, brazenly. For their acts we cannot reasonably hold gentlemen of recognized character responsible. The Republican Committee did all in its power to honorably elect the men nominated by the Convention, and did not resort to the use of money to corrupt voters. We believe their action will be endorsed by citizens of respectability, who believe as we do, that a partial defeat after a manly fight, is to be preferred over victory that could have been accomplished by a resort to criminal methods. The Republican ticket was, perhaps, the best nominated in this county for years, and yet the expenses on that side, of conducting the campaign, were excessive, and were made so, in a large measure, by gentlemen whom we do not believe intended it should have been so.

Oscar Fay Adams, in the North American Review, is extremely severe on woman's intolercancy when woman is concerned. The closing part of his article is particularly caustic. "The judgments which man passes upon his fellows are tolerant where woman's are narrow, because, instead of the one aspect of the question which she perceives, he sees many; they are merciful where hers are cruel, because he recognizes more fully the stress of temptation and the complexity of motive which leads to transgression. There have been a few women who have helped their weaker sisters to rise when they have fallen, but they are indeed few. The majority of women have done what they could to keep those who are down still in that position. They have refused to believe in the possibility of reform; they have withdrawn from all contact with those who have once found temptation greater than they could bear; they have by their inflexible attitude, made a return to virtue nearly impossible on the part of those who have once turned from it. Who should be tenderer toward a woman's sin than a virtuous woman, and who is harder? O you queens, who have with your virtuous hands thrust your weaker sisters still further in the mire; who have shown aversion where you might have shown mercy; who have hardened your hearts, that should have been soft with pity; who have turned coldly aside from those, your sisters, whom you might have saved, and gone your ways as though they were not; O you who have lifted from your heads the crown of gentleness and mercy that all your sex should wear, are you not 'ruthless' indeed?"

There is a beautiful poetic fancy, which compares the American ballot to the flakes of snow as they fall silently in their purity. The idea is a grand one to contemplate, and it would, indeed, be an Arcadian epoch if the magnificent sentiment were ratified. But the poet's ideal has little verification when we see the hordes—we might say herds—of human cattle on each succeeding election day bartering and offering to barter the dearest right of the American freeman, for money—some for small, and others for larger sums. This infamy is not confined to the sordid tramp or bumner, but men, or those in the image of man, who wear the garb of respectability, rank among the list of strikers, and are importunate for remuneration for their votes. Yet we call the result obtained through this means, the free expression of the will of the people at the ballot box. It is absolutely astounding to what extent in the large cities this system of ballot purchasing is carried on. Even in our city of 27,000 souls, there is a small army of these merchantable cattle, and whose voice with the "pure and silent" ballot often defeats the will of the people. It sometimes shakes our faith in our system of elections and we are constrained to deprecate the wide latitude given by our laws for the exercise of the elective franchise. There is no doubt but what there would be purer elections if the elective franchise were restricted and limited in very many particulars. It seems to be antagonistic to our liberal system of government, that the will of the people should be defeated through the agency of those who do not value their rights and privileges with the greatest of all rights—the free exercise of the ballot. Men who use the right only for the revenue that is in it, should be denied the right to vote. It would be better to restrict the franchise in the future, rather than extend it.

The International American Conference, so far as the American Republics are concerned, formulated a treaty and plan for the protection of the rights of literary and artistic property. This is a wise and just course, and should be made applicable to all countries, particularly to England and France. The author of any literary and artistic work, and his successors, shall enjoy in the contracting States, the rights accorded him by the law of the State in which the original publication took place. This right includes the right to dispose of it or convey to another, to translate or authorize translation, or to reproduce his work in any form. The protection exists only for such length of time as prescribed by the State where the work originated, if that be the shorter time. Literary or artistic works mean, all books, pamphlets, dramatic or musical writings, drawings, paintings, sculptures, engravings, photographs, and all productions in the field of literature or art. Translators shall also enjoy the right of copyright, but shall not prevent other translations. Newspaper articles may be reproduced upon quoting the publication from whence they are taken. Speeches made in deliberative bodies, before tribunals of justice, or at public meetings, may be published without any authorization. Under the head of illicit reproductions are classed all unauthorized appropriation of literary or artistic work, which may be designated by different names as adaptations, such being considered as a reproduction without presenting the character of an original work. Where authors wish to withhold their names, they must inform the editors that the rights of authorship belong to them. The jurisdiction against those who appropriate the fruits of the author's labors, is in the country where the fraud is committed. All literary or artistic work which may be considered as against good morals, may be refused the protection of this international copyright. There is a provision of this treaty which permits other nations not represented in this Conference, to avail themselves of this protection by adopting this treaty.

The developments in the case of George Nelson, through the confession of stage robber Shinn, go a long ways towards an admonition against the mere conjectures of juries. At the trial, the writer was called into the case for the defense, after the jury had been taken and some testimony given. We had known the defendant for many years, and through the earnest request of Wm. Boyne, undertook the conduct of the defense with Judge Tubbs. From the outset we felt assured of the innocence of Nelson. The trial proceeded and one Davis gave testimony to the effect that he had known Nelson six weeks, and could and did recognize his voice and general appearance, as the party who robbed him. One Cownie corroborated Davis so far as the description and robbery was concerned. This evidence made a strong circumstantial case. Defendant Nelson produced several witnesses by whom a clear alibi was established. Here comes the vital question in the case. Under the law the jury is the sole judge of the weight of evidence, and in the deliberations of the jury this testimony, although unimpeached, was disregarded, and the evidence of Davis, supported by Cownie's deposition, was taken as true, and upon the circumstances detailed, Nelson was convicted. Counsel for Nelson felt that a great wrong had been done and that an innocent man must suffer, therefore took every possible means of securing a new trial. It was perfectly evident that the jury, which was composed of good men, but men of strong opinions and who leaned against any one charged with crime, in fact a very bad jury for the defense if there was any evidence for conviction. This case was tried at a time when there was much newspaper and public comment concerning the miscarriage of justice in an important criminal case, which fact necessarily prejudiced their minds against all defendants. From the unsatisfactory character of the evidence upon which this conviction was based, and the fact that a clear alibi had been established, the counsel for defense made an appeal to the nisi prius Court for a new trial. The learned Judge was so firmly impressed with the guilt of Nelson that he denied the motion for a new trial, disregarding the testimony of the four witnesses who established the fact that at the time of the robbery Nelson was elsewhere with them. When this order denying a new trial was made, the only recourse was in appeal to the Supreme Court. Nelson was without means; no counsel fees had been paid, each attorney for defense having contributed his services, as they felt assured, in the interest of justice to an innocent man. William Boyne volunteered to bear half the expenses of appeal, the editors of THEMIS performed the labor and bore the other half of the expense, and the case was appealed. Now the Codes of this State provide that an appeal may be taken and heard on the grounds that the evidence does not justify the verdict of a jury, and upon this ground, among others of a technical character, the appeal was based. It was shown by the transcript that the testimony of Davis and Cownie was merely an opinion, which in the face of the positive testimony of four witnesses that Nelson was not at the immediate scene of the robbery at the time, should not be allowed to support the arbitrary verdict of the jury. Under a long line of decisions by the Supreme Court, which was undoubtedly prompted by the great volume of business before that tribunal, the Court has established a rule in which the law granting a right to a hearing on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence, has been practically abrogated in this, that where there is a conflict in evidence the appellate Court will not disturb the verdict. There could scarcely arise a case of a criminal nature, wherein a conflict of a greater or less degree would not arise, which fact precludes a genuine hearing on its merits. The unfortunate victim of circumstances, Nelson, was therefore refused a new trial by the Supreme Court, which declined to pass upon the merits of the case, following the rule above mentioned. If our Supreme Court could be relieved of the formidable array of cases that constantly encumber the records, there might be more attention given to the real merits of cases, rather than the application of technical rules. We think that Judge McFarland had the right idea in his able article contributed to the Overland Monthly a number of years ago, and before he became a member of the Supreme Court. There he maintained that each case in the Supreme Court should be considered on its merits, and decided thereon without regard to the technical questions involved. It is right that a Court, which is calm and deliberate, should carefully review and consider the verdict of a jury, which is very often governed by passion, prejudice, or dense ignorance. Jurors are called upon, particularly in civil actions, to pass on grave scientific and mathematical questions, of which they are utterly without knowledge or the means of knowledge. Certainly in such cases a verdict must be mere guess work. So in the case of Nelson, the jury simply guessed that he was guilty, when the great preponderance of evidence showed him innocent. It seems almost like a Fate or Divine interposition that Nelson should be vindicated and his innocence proved after all. The confession of robber Shinn, who looks and speaks very much like Nelson, discloses that he is innocent of the crime. This case should be a warning in the future for juries to be very careful in acting upon circumstantial evidence, particularly with regard to the identity of the human voice, and appearances. We trust Nelson will be promptly released from prison by the Governor.

Astor Thrift and Meanness.

The present head of the Astor family, W. W. Astor, bids fair to win the reputation of being the meanest of his line—and that is saying a great deal. He has received honors at the hands of his party, having been elected State Senator and made Minister to Italy, and he drew his full salary every time. The other day a telegram was sent across the ocean to him saying that an excellent Municipal Citizens' ticket had been nominated, and asking him to contribute. He cabled back: "Regret. Am free from all political interests." In other words, he is mean enough to let other people look after party interests and foot the bills. But it is just what might have been expected from "Willie" Astor. He was a member of the Seventh Regiment when their armory was built, and at the time the big fair was held to furnish it, his company, K, expected he would do something handsome. He sent a $25 puppy dog in a basket with directions that it should not be sold for less than $25, and neither he nor his wife went near the fair nor spent a penny on it. After two years' service "Willie" wanted to be retired and enter the Veteran Corps, and Colonel Clark insisted he should be admitted to oblige the Astors. The Veterans refused, very properly, and this led to the famous war between Colonel Clark and the Veterans, in which the latter finally conquered.

Col. Hankthunder (of Kentucky)—Some pretty fine pictures here. What's the price of that one? Attendant—Two hundred dollars. "One of the old masters, ain't it?" No, sir. It's a water-color by Hugg." "John?" "No, sir." "Say it again. What's the price?" "Two hundred dollars." "What color?" "Water-color." "Just water?" "Yes." "Which is the quickest way to get out of here?"

Mr. Veneering's Library.

His shelves are covered up with row on row
Of small flat boxes—books of wood and paint—
The labelled backs of which all seemed to show
That he with letters was right well acquainted.

His neighbors, knowing well no book was there,
That all was but a yellow pine veneer,
Were wont to laugh at him and at his lair;
But he ignored their laughter and their sneer.

"You've books, I notice, on your shelves," said he;
"Real books are they, for which you've richly paid,
You never read 'em, though, and I can't see Why you should jeer at me and so upbraid."

"An empty box well painted and designed
Is good as any book I ever knew,
If one's not of the literary kind,
And, better still, a great sight cheaper, too."

Now as I think of him who took this stand,
And then of those who own yet scan no page,
I deem the latter class a sorry band,
And him a rathier level-headed sage.—Harper.

A WONDERFUL LITERARY FORGER.

In an Albanian village there died recently one of the most original and artistic swindlers of the present century. Alcibiades Simonides was a master of drawing, a fine lithographer, and an excellent chemist. He was an omnivorous reader of history, which he retained to the smallest details in the iron grip of his memory. He had eloquence, ingenuity, and perseverance. All of these talents he devoted to a single purpose. He made a profession of swindling the most learned of his contemporaries.

Simonides made his debut at the age of thirty-five at Athens. He then laid before the King of Greece a mass of apparently priceless manuscripts. They were seemingly of great antiquity, and included works which had long been lost to civilization. Simonides explained that he and his uncle had discovered the manuscripts in the Cloister Chilandarim on Mount Athos. He told just how and when the manuscripts were found, and fortified every sentence with copious references to literary history and classical authorities. The King bought $10,000 worth of the treasures, and Simonides disappeared.

In a year he was back again with another batch of marvelously valuable old manuscripts. Among them was an ancient Homer, written on lotos leaves, and accompanied by a complete commentary of Eustatius. The King wished to buy the whole lot, but could not see his way clear to raising money for more than half of it. The rest of the manuscripts he recommended for purchase to the University of Athens. The rector of the university was not without misgivings as to the smooth stories of Simonides, and at his suggestion a commission of twelve scholars was appointed to test the genuineness of the documents. After a long investigation eleven members of the commission reported that the manuscripts were authentic. The twelfth, Professor Mavraki, called for a new investigation, which was eventually made. The result was the discovery that Simonides' Homer was a verbatim copy, even to the typographical errors, of Wolff's edition. The commission summoned Simonides to appear before it and explain, but he had got wind of the state of affairs and had skipped away with the proceeds of the sales to the King.

For a few years he was completely lost to view. His performance in Athens was almost forgotten. In the middle of the sixties he turned up, unrecognized and unsuspected, in Constantinople with an old Greek work concerning hieroglyphics and an Assyrian manuscript with an interlinear Phœnician translation. For the delectation of Armenian scholars he had also brought a Greek history of Armenia. He found patrons enough and had soon transformed his manuscripts into cash to the amount of about $40,000. When the introduction and the first chapter of the Armenian history were published, it was remarked that the names of the Armenian Generals were not Armenian, and Simonides was again missing when called upon for explanations.

The slight historical error as to the Armenian Generals and their names wound up the first period of Simonides' career and led him to vary somewhat his manner of working in his future schemes. The first evidence of this change was his announcement to western European scholars some time later, that he possessed a roll dating from the days when the French and Venetians ruled Constantinople. In this roll, he said, a monk had recorded that there were buried manuscripts of great age and value at various spots on the Bosphorus. The location of these spots was described accurately in the roll.

In a certain cloister, Simonides said, might be found the Acts of the first Apostolic Concilium of Antioch. Eventually Simonides sought the aid of the Patriarch in unearthing these treasures. The Patriarch, however, answered that "these acts were superfluous. Either they confirmed or contradicted the canons of the Greek Church. In the first case they were useless; in the second, they were worse than useless, and the finding of them would be a criminal deed." Simonides then waited on the Minister of Public Works, Ismail Pasha. The Pasha was in his harem when Simonides called, and so the forger busied himself with a little exploration of the garden while waiting. He buried a small box under a big fig tree there, and, when the Pasha appeared, remarked that the garden seemed to be the location of buried manuscripts mentioned in this and that classical work. After screwing the Pasha's interest up to the necessary ardor, he suggested that digging for the manuscripts should begin at once. He directed that the first excavation be made under the fig tree. In a few minutes the Pasha's workmen struck a curious old box, in which lay a bit of discolored parchment bearing a poem ostensibly written by Aristotle. The Pasha was delighted, and filled Simonides hands with Turkish money. A few days later Ismail was brought down from the clouds by the remark of his gardener that the fig tree in question had been transplanted only twenty years before, and that all the ground on and about the spot where the box was found had been dug up thoroughly at that time. The Pasha's chagrin was so great that he made no effort to bring Simonides to justice.

The cunning old Greek derived encouragement from the impunity with which he had executed his latest maneuver. He looked around him for another Turkish victim, and decided that he had found him in Ibrahim Pasha. Ibrahim had just broken ground for the erection of a building on the site of the ancient Byzantine hippodrome. Simonides told him that a few yards below the surface, at a certain spot, there must be an Arabian manuscript. The Pasha's workmen dug there, but found nothing. "Let me dig," exclaimed Simonides. He dug, and in five minutes handed the Pasha a curious bronze box. Within it was an Arabian poem on parchment. The Pasha wished immediately to give Simonides a splendid reward. He was stopped, however, by a laborer, who said he had seen the Greek slip the little chest from his sleeve into the hole. There was a dispute of considerable violence, and eventually the decision of the points of authenticity and veracity was postponed to the next day. That was the last Ibrahim Pasha saw of Simonides.

Two months later Simonides appeared at the British Museum with a memorandum of General Belisarius to the Emperor Justinian. He sold it for $3,200 to the Duke of Sutherland, and also disposed of a beautiful letter from Alcibiades to Pericles to the same purchaser for $1,000. When the fraud was discovered Simonides was away off on the continent again. No trace of him could be found, and the scholars of Europe hoped and thought they were at last relieved of this disturber of the traditions of antiquity. One day, however, the news came from the Athos cloisters that the indefatigable forger was loose again, under the assumed name of Baricourt. The monks throughout that part of the world were warned against him, and he was eventually caught in the Iberian cloister in the act of adding to an old manuscript a little supplementary matter of his own composition. He was rushed out, the warning against him was published far and near, and he was made so notorious that his profession ceased to be profitable.

One of the last meetings of the learned doctor with a man of the world occurred in Corfu a few years ago. A correspondent of the Vienna Tageblatt returned to his room in the hotel one evening to find on his table a card bearing the words: "The deceased Dr. Alcibiades Simonides. Meet me on the Esplanade at midnight to learn of a matter of the greatest importance." At the midnight meeting Simonides explained that he called himself deceased, not only because he was dead to the world, but because in a recent illness he had been pronounced physically dead, he had been put into his coffin and had been lowered into his grave, and had been aroused by the gravel falling on the lid just in time to secure his release by a tremendous knocking and groaning. The purpose of Simonides' appointment, however, was to show a document apparently written by Leopold the Glorious, in which the Babenberger Prince related in the form of a diary his experiences during the Crusades, including some highly interesting particulars of his meeting with Richard the Lion-hearted. Simonides described how he had picked up this work in Jerusalem, and had brought it away with the idea of selling it to the Vienna Academy of Sciences.

At the time of his death Simonides was seventy-two. He was of medium height, thin as a bone, and moved mechanically. He had small eyes, a jaundiced skin, and lips like paper. A big black beard hung to his waist. While conversing he held his arms crossed on his breast. He never smiled, had no friends, and died alone without leaving a person to mourn for him. He had existed for nearly forty years by imposing on men of great learning in the field of their special knowledge. He was probably one of the most erudite rascals that ever lived.—New York Sun.

Madame Patti tells how she preserves her voice; she gives it plenty of rest. What a boon it would be to all of us if some people we know would follow this prescription.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

The Gaiety Theatre Company from London will be seen in a burlesque of Joan of Arc on their American tour.

Few bassos of this period can hope to leave a reputation that will last two centuries, yet Richard Leveridge is still written about in England.

Lucrezia Borgia's portrait has been discovered in Eastnor Castle, the seat of Lord Henry Somerset, near Malvern. It is by Gentile Bellini, and is signed.

Signor Paola La Villa's opera for children, entitled The Katydid, was sung by sixty little inmates of the Female Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum on Madison Avenue last week.

Capoul, the tenor, who has been farming for some years past, has written the libretto of an opera entitled the Black Prince, and Duprato has written the music. It is a Russian story.

Probably not until some return is made to the old stock company, and the fly-by-night shows become less numerous, will any great progress be made in the return to honesty of stage work.

Agneeritus, the Hunchback, is the name of a four-act historical tragedy which will be produced in New York after the holidays. The scenes of the play are laid in Greece in the time of Pericles.

One of the big scenes in Kajanka is where the Hindoo idol is struck by lightning, and the entire scene is transformed in an instant to an Indian terrace with prismatic fountains from each step of the magic staircase.

Mrs. Kendal, whose stage reminiscences have just been published, has been elected a member of the Society of Young Girls of Pure Character on the Stage, in New York; M. S. Y. G. P. C. S. will now be added to her name.

One of the beauties of the famous Comedie Francaise of Paris is Mme. Pierson. She is a blue-eyed blonde, with luxuriant hair that Alexander Dumas declared to be "made of woven sunbeams." She is quite plump of figure and somewhat above medium height.

The profits of the Nero spectacle at Niblo's in New York, within the next twenty weeks will reach $100,000. In Nero there is a dramatic cast of thirty people, a ballet of 110, 275 extra men as senators, prætors, etc., 200 women as Christians and Nazarenes, making over 500 people actually engaged in the performance.

Mrs. Bernard Beere, the Sarah Bernhardt of the English speaking stage, will tour this country next season under the management of E. G. Gilmore and Alex Comstock, of the Academy of Music, New York. Mrs. Beere brings a full English company, and ten full sets of scenery from London for the presentation of a repertoire of excellent plays.

The Old Homestead, now a positive fixture at the Academy of Music, New York, will shortly celebrate its one thousandth performance. Already a petition is being widely circulated, praying the Mayor to fix the day as a local holiday. Of course, there will be a souvenir, but just what to present is a question that is agitating the managerial mind. Uncle Joshua was consulted and suggested a load of hay.

The Abbott company sang Ernani in St. Louis and the critics said that the part taken by Emma herself was the weakest in the cast. Upon this the Kansas City Star comments that such is the revenge which the papers of the Missouri valley metropolis take upon Abbott for making more money than any other prima donna in the country. Carping at success is exceedingly poor business. But a certain class of critics seem to especially delight in it.

The cry that melodrama has had its day is very forcibly answered by the continued success of The Soudan, at the Boston Theatre, Boston. The fourth week just ended was even larger than the first, and it looks now as though it would continue for the balance of the season. Such powerful attractions as Booth and Barrett, Jefferson and Florence, and others, were paid handsome sums to cancel their time at the Boston Theatre that The Soudan might have clear sailing.

Gilmore & Comstock, of the Academy of Music, New York, are quietly engaging some of the very cleverest people in the profession for next season's tour of the new spectacular farce comedy, A High Roller. Besides the usual elements that go to make up the ordinary farce comedy, A High Roller will have the additional advantage of a modernized ballet of twenty-four of the best dancers that can be secured. Another feature of the entertainment will be the appearance in this country of the Lupino troupe of pantomimists of Paris.

Nat Goodwin recently claimed that he had created more roles and played more parts in the last eight or ten years than any other star. In proof of this he quoted the following list: "Hobbies," "The Ramblers," "Members for Slocum," "Skating Rink," "The Black Flag," "Confusion," "Jack Shepherd," "Big Pony," "The Royal Revenge," "Goliath in 'Lend Me Five Shillings,'" burlesque on "Richelieu," "The Bells," and "Julius Cæsar," the comedies of "A Gold Mine," "The Bookmaker," "Col. Tom," and "The Nominee," besides putting on "Patience," appearing in the "Mascot," "Cinderella at School," and being concerned in the production of ten or a dozen different farces.

The status of the business of the current theatrical attractions in New York is thus epitomized: Academy, The Old Homestead; enormous. Niblo's, Claudius Nero; tremendous. Metropolitan Opera House, closed. Broadway Theatre, Paul Jones; prosperous. Palmer's, Jefferson-Florence; distinguished. Bijou Theatre, City Directory; substantial. Fifth Avenue Theatre, Kendall's; ultra. Madison Square Theatre, Mansfield; ordinary. Madison Square Garden, Seidl Concerts; still losing. Garden Theatre, Dr. Bill; sick. Casino, Poor Jonathan; good, no tights. Daly's, New Lamps for Old; prosperous. Fourteenth Street Theatre, Blue Jeans; prosperous. Lyceum Theatre, The Master of Woodbarrow; prosperous. Hermann's Gaiety, Suzette; vitality low. Star Theatre, The Senator; sessions large. Twenty-third Street Theatre, Men and Women; prosperous. Union Square Theatre, County Fair.

Artistic excellence and the quality called "popular" are the two stools between which the theatre manager is now, as he always was, in danger of falling. The grand-opera manager of twenty years ago, or "impresario" as he was then called, would have nothing but Italian music sung to Italian words by a prima donna with a great name, at a thousand dollars a night. There was probably a good baritone voice in the company, possibly a good tenor, certainly a scant chorus, shabbily costumed, shop-worn caricatures for scenery, and generally a deficient orchestra. The result was too many nights of empty houses at four dollars a seat, and the manager who persevered was sure to come to grief. If, on the other hand, the company was made complete in orchestra, chorus, costumes, scenery and leading singers, the dear public could not be induced to pay four dollars a seat in sufficient numbers to save the venture from wreck. The people who went mainly because it was fashionable did not go often enough, and those who would have gone for the enjoyment didn't have the money.

"Carmen Sylva," Queen of Roumania, is going to dedicate a poem to Queen Victoria. Pending the latter's declaration of war it behooves the powers to hustle around and get their armies in the field at once. This matter is altogether too serious to admit of delay. Mrs. Dorothy Tennent Stanley writes in her book. "I asked a little girl how she would define love. Unhesitatingly she answered: 'It's going on errands.' I asked a little boy the meaning of the word guilt. 'It means telling on another boy.' I asked Harry Sullivan to define gentleman. He replied, not without some fervor: 'Oh, a fellow who has a watch and chain.' I suppose he read disappointment in my face, for he hastily added, 'and loves Jesus.' This same boy had a very hazy idea of Old Testament history. He had heard of Adam and Eve: 'They stole apples and were turned out of the garden, and then they had to work for a living until the sweat poured down.' A girl of eleven told me she wished to live in the country, 'because then I shouldn't see a lot of people having a lot of things I can't have.'"

Pittsburger in California wrote to a bachelor friend at home the other day describing the vineyards he had seen and the wine he had sampled. Do you know what the law recognizes as a "guest" in a hotel? I'll tell you. A guest is a person who is a transient boarder, and can leave at any moment, providing his bill be paid. But a person who has hired a room or rooms for a certain amount of money, payable weekly, is not a guest. He is a sub-tenant, and the law doesn't give him any show for redress. Slap this at your intelligence and recollect it.

Justice Miller saw President Lincoln for the last time at the inaugural ball given in honor of the second election, says the Chicago Tribune. The President turned to him with great cordiality and said: "How are the Justices and their gowns?" Judge Miller replied that they were all right, and President Lincoln went on. "Miller, you were brought up on a farm, weren't you?" "Yes," replied the Judge. "Well," said President Lincoln, "you must have seen the breaking of land and the burning of timber in a clearing. You have seen the heavy bark fall off from a half-decayed log, while out from under the bark would come great winged ants, which would waddle off with the funniest kind of clumsy dignity. Do you know, Judge, I never see one of you Justices with your gowns on but I think of these ants which we used to see on the farm in clearing."

In a South Carolina city, not many years ago, a fight occurred on the street between two citizens. One of the belligerents, breaking away from the other, rushed into the middle of the street and picked up a stone, which he threw at his antagonist with great force. The other dodged, and the missile smashed through a plate glass window in the front of a store. The proprietor ran out hurriedly, and soon had the two men taken before a police magistrate for trial. The case hinged upon who should pay for the broken window. The Justice heard a good many witnesses, and when he had taken the testimony of the fighters themselves he pondered for a few moments, and then delivered himself as follows: "There is no doubt that a window was broken. Who is to pay for it? There is no doubt that the man who threw the stone had no intention of inflicting any damage on the window. He threw it at his antagonist. Had the latter remained still, he would, in all probability have been struck by the stone, and the window would not have been broken. Now, therefore, in view of the fact that the thrower of the stone had no desire to break the window, and as it was done only when the other man dodged, I declare that the damages for the window are to be charged to the man who would have been struck had he not stepped aside in order to be safe from the stone. The other prisoner is discharged."—Harper's Magazine.

"The Seven Ages of Man" were depicted by Japanese artists long before they became famous in Shakespearean recitations in this country, and perhaps before Shakespeare was born. The people all over the nation are disposed to resent the attempts of individuals to think for them. It is not improbable that the defeat of the Republican party in several Eastern and Western strongholds is due as much to the attempted dictation of individuals who pose as spokesmen for the party, as to any other cause. In this State the great Democratic "boss" has been laid out on the same principle. If the people will only think for themselves there will be no danger of any bad government. We mean, if they think and act at the same time.

General Howard asks Congress to provide for the increase of the army from 25,000 to 35,000. This is a wise recommendation, but the increase should be to at least 50,000. The handful of men distributed to each station amounts to nothing. It is always safe to have a goodly number of trained men in an emergency. Our National Guard is valuable in this direction, but men trained in the field of action are better fitted to command in the event of war or outbreaks. A school of battalions is also recommended, where boys from 17 to 21 can be trained as a source of supply for material for non-commissioned officers. These can ultimately be promoted to the rank of commissioned officers when opportunity offers.

Only a thinking man is free in the broad sense of the term. An ignorant man is always a slave to his passions and prejudices. When questions of good and economical government arise, it is rare, indeed, that an ignorant man can be convinced beyond his supposed individual interest. It not unfrequently occurs that his action in public matters are directly in conflict with his real welfare, yet he acts upon that false impulse rather than reason. One of the greatest dangers that besets our system of government is from the unthinking citizens, who do not reason upon the great economic measures, and who do not try to become informed. Men must think for themselves, and not allow others to do their thinking, if they contemplate becoming true Americans.

The people of California evidently comprehend the benefits of the new tariff regulations better than our Eastern and Western brethren. We realize the results of protection to our industries and have voted accordingly. But it will take time to educate the workingman and farmer of the East and West so that the true benefits of a protective tariff shall be understood. It is well that this question has been brought to the test at this time, in order that there may be proper understanding of the situation, and the practical workings of the tariff scheme before the contest of 1892. We have faith in the great will of the people when expressed under a full understanding of the issues and the situation. Fraud, deceit, passion, prejudice or money may prevent the true expression of will of the people, but this in due time will give place to the right.

EDITOR THEMIS: At the recent election, by way of experiment, I scratched the name of Judge Van Fleet on my ticket, and wrote the name "McGinty" opposite thereto. When the judges came to count my ballot, they were puzzled to know whether it should be counted "no vote," for Van Fleet, McGinty, or scattering. The argument that finally prevailed was that as McGinty was at the bottom of the sea, he could not be running for Superior Judge, hence the ballot should be counted as if McGinty's name were not written. I was an interested listener to the profound discussion and saw my ballot counted for Van Fleet. I hold that it should have been counted for whom it was cast, or at least as scattering. What right had the judges to conclude on mere hearsay evidence, that McGinty ever reached the bottom, or to assume that I would vote for an individual whose bones were whitening down in "the dark untathomed caves of ocean?" There might be a hundred McGinty's in Sacramento county. Had I seen fit to vote for Jones or Brown, does any sane man pretend to say that the ballot should have been counted for some one else? While not apprehending that the foundations of our republican form of government are being shaken, I think a ballot should not be counted for a candidate when the name of that candidate is scratched and the name of another man written opposite thereto. *

The Pittsburg Dispatch comes to the rescue of the dress coat, and takes the New York people to task for trying to discard it. This will never do! Are our millionaires determined to ignore the claims of society upon them to respect its conveniences? Shall they be permitted to cast down by one cruel blow the work of the McAllisters and De Lancey Kanes, who have spent laborious years in building up the walls of the social Zion to the point where it resembles English society—at least in the matter of male habiliments? The painstaking tuition of the New York mind, that if the male of the species does not enshrine himself in a swallow tail coat at 7 p. m. before going anywhere he is no better than a Philistine, is all cast down. The spectacle of the fluent Depew, backed by the repres natives of $400,000,000, discarding all the traditions of the man milliners, and unblushingly appear at the theatre in cutaway coats and light gray trousers, brings to naught all the work that has been done to raise the autocracy of clothes to its lofty position. These d'soyal persons should be warned. There are limits beyond which even corporation Presidents and multi-millionaires must not go. It may do for them to ignore State Constitutions and override the regulative statutes of the United States. But when they trample under foot the sacred and unalterable law of the dress coat, they should be aware that the outraged feelings of society will express themselves by calling these rascals no better than vulgar common people.

Whatever is fated that will take place. The great immense mind of Jove is not to be transgressed. We are liable to shocks from earthquakes. It was an old superstition, if not an idea, that our and other planets are subject to destruction by comets. Recent events, as disclosed by the election, show the hand of fate, and it is in the interest of the people, as represented by the Republican party. Those whom it is desired to purify are suited that they may realize what the immutable laws of philosophy demand. Those things which we have feared can be made our servants by the application of proper rules of reason and philosophy. Every calamity inures to the general welfare in some form, although at the time not apparent. War, pestilence, defeat, killing frosts are but the forerunners of future prosperity. When we read the news from the East and West, as to the result of the Congressional election, we felt that the result was nothing more than a timely admonition to purify the grand old party for the great contest in 1892. In many ways it might be said that the immense mind of Jove has been transgressed by individual members of the Republican party, for which there must follow a limited degree of chastisement. What we might now deem a calamity is but the harbinger of victory in 1892. Evils have grown up within the party lines which must be eradicated and we take it that fate has given us this advance warning to make us realize that a due regard for the will of the people must be considered. The great tariff measures will be ultimately explained to the working people and farmers of the West, who now evidently look upon them as detrimental to their welfare. When they are educated to the true principles there will be no longer an opposition such as has been manifest in the last election. The great majority in Congress at the next session in favor of Democratic doctrines can safely be relied upon to do acts which will vindicate the wisdom and sound policy of the late Republican legislation of Congress. This election will serve a good purpose, and it is not within the power of the next Congress to do any harm otherwise than to the Democratic party. The truism of General Grant, that the Democratic party can always be relied on to do the wrong thing at the right time, will be verified.

Au Revoir.

Breathes there a Democrat so full,
Who in the past has had his "pull,"
Who ne'er of late to himself hath said,
"Oh, give us a rest; Pond's ahead?"
If such there be, go Markham well!
For him now there's rest in—Well
He's at rest for four years yet.
But there's an office he's got to get,
'Tis the Miserere, office of the dead;
Incantation slow, with solemn tread;
Funeral dirge writ for souls departed;
Writ for such as stood the fray; noble hearted

Heroes, now among the lowly.
Cruel fate that bade the holy Ones of Buckley's venal tribe
Take it easy and their time abide
For the sack of hope, 'twould truly come
As sure as fate, yea, or the rising sun.
Alack! the day, that fated day
The people's choice went not that way.
By the power of the political giver,
The Democracy has gone up Salt River.

Clay's Character.

G. P. A. Healy writes as follows in the North American Review: "On one occasion he (Henry Clay) said to me: 'Mr. Healy, you are a capital portrait painter, and you are the first that has ever done justice to my mouth, and it is well pleased to express its gratitude.' Clay's mouth was a very peculiar one—thin-lipped and extending almost from ear to ear. 'But,' he added, 'you are an indifferent courtier, though you come to us from the French King's presence, you have not once spoken to me of my live stock. Don't you know that I am prouder of my cows and sheep than of my best speeches.'"

"On another occasion I proved a worse courtier still. His jealousy of Jackson is well known, and the two men formed a very striking contrast. During a long sitting he spoke of his old rival, and, knowing that I had just painted the dying man's portrait, he said:

"You, who have lived so long abroad, far from our political contests and quarrels, ought to be an impartial judge. Jackson, during his lifetime, was held up as a sort of hero; now that he is dead his admirers want to make him out a saint. Do you think he was sincere?"

"I have just come from his death bed," I answered, "and if General Jackson was not sincere, then I do not know the meaning of the word."

"I shall never forget the keen look shot at me from under Mr. Clay's eyebrows; but he merely observed:

"I see that you, like all who approach that man, were fascinated by him."

One of the Astors and two of the Vanderbilts appeared at the theatre the other night in ordinary every day frock coats. But that need not be taken as an indication that the fashionable world is growing careless regarding evening dress. Minstrels, waiters, sword-swallowers, and men who are a bit doubtful as to their social status will continue to wear the swallowtail coat.

Two men have no need of philosophy—those who have no leisure for it, and those who have.

Mr. Blaine Whistles.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in his address at Philadelphia, a few days before the election, told the following story of Blaine:

"Strange enough, this morning as I noticed Mr. Blaine take his seat in a chair in the corner of the car I heard some one whistling. Wondering who it was, I looked up to find that the man who makes great speeches can whistle; and especially he can whistle down his enemies. But what do you think he was whistling?"

"Annie Rooney," shouted a voice in the gallery, and the entire audience roared with laughter for several minutes.

"No, something better and sweeter than that. It was the touch of old memories which were perhaps unconsciously coming over his heart as his face was turned toward his old home. He was whistling 'Auld Lang Syne.' And it seems to me, as I come back here to-day, that your old Scotch-Irish has set you all to singing again that same old tune."

The result of the election in the Keystone State does not smack much of "Auld Lang Syne," however.

Dr. Mary Walker's Claim.

On July 24, Senator Evarts introduced a bill for the relief of Dr. Mary E. Walker. The records of the War Department do not go far toward substantiating her claim for $10,000. They state that she was professionally examined and nominally commissioned as an acting assistant surgeon. The language of the report made by the examining surgeon states that Dr. Walker's knowledge of materia medica is not superior to that possessed by any ordinary housewife, and that he deemed her only competent to act as a female nurse. Notwithstanding this report she was assigned to duty as nominal acting assistant surgeon with the Fifty-second Ohio Infantry, then in the front, so that she might have a chance to go through the lines and get information of the enemy.

Her intrepidity is well known to the Army of the Cumberland. Her self assigned duty as a scout compelled her to masquerade for the first time in men's attire. In that dress she was captured, but the discovery of her sex saved her from being hanged as a spy. She endured all the hardships of the other prisoners. Her knowledge of medicine proved of very great benefit to the Union men. After a while liberties were given her that were unusual. The authorities permitted her to walk up and down the prison enclosure on the outside. She never walked alone, however, but was always escorted by a huge bloodhound, who was as faithful to the Confederate side as she was loyal to the Northern side. He would lag along behind until the limits of the walk were reached, when he would step to the front and cause her to turn round again. He could not speak, but his attitude was very significant.

She was sent North on August 10, 1864, and soon afterward was placed in charge of the female prison at Louisville. Subsequently she was sent to Clarksville, Tenn., to take charge of the refugee home. Her commission expired on May 25, 1865. For her services she was paid altogether $1202.52. She now draws a pension of $20 a month. She is almost blind and is obliged to use the most powerful glasses to see. Added to that infirmity she has lately broken her leg and is suffering much pain.

It is doubtful if Congress gives the sum she asks, although it has been approved by the War Claims Committee of the House four times. She did, for a woman, perform excellent service, and there are many claims on the calendars of both houses that are less meritorious than Dr. Mary Walker's.—Chicago Herald.

The Girls Who Ride.

The riding masters say that the sudden and unusual popularity of equestrianism among women can be traced directly to the physicians. A very few years ago women were frowned upon when they suggested horseback exercise to their doctors. Even the most advanced physicians considered that riding was too wearing and violent for women of frail physique, and the horses that sold best were small, gentle and broken to a "single-foot" gait.

After animals of this type had been ridden extensively for five or six years physicians generally learned that riding them was a little more wearing on women than lolling in a rocking-chair. Gradually "single-footers" were abandoned and horses broken to a trot were taken up. Nine-tenths of the women in Central Park nowadays ride horses that have a gait which men would find irksome.

The result justifies the violence of the exercise. No more striking groups of women can be found in town than the straight-backed, lithe, clear-skinned, bright-eyed, healthy and athletic horse-women who meet at the riding-schools and start out for a morning trot in the park between the hours of 8 and 11 every day but Sunday.—New York Sun.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

The Stowaway did not meet with much success in this city during its last engagement, on account of the excitement attending the election. People preferred the news, to any form of drama, other than the great election drama.

The Cleveland Minstrels last night played to a full house. It is rare, indeed, when this class of entertainment does not draw. The last performance to-night, when "standing room" will be the order, unless seats are secured in advance.

The Hanlon Martinetti Volter Troupe will appear upon a return engagement at the Metropolitan on Monday night, November 10th. There will be some new features in the performance including a pantomime, A Duel in the Snow.

Prudery Run Mad.

One day last week a little cash-boy, eleven years old, lost his situation in a popular retail store on Kearny street, San Francisco, under peculiar circumstances; under circumstances that should forever cause the boycott of that house by every person who deals in such goods as it has for sale. The wife of a first-rank lawyer was shopping in the store. Her purchase having been made she awaited her change, which was soon brought to her by the boy, not yet a dozen years in the world. The little fellow, to accommodate her, placed it on the counter on her right hand side, to do which he was compelled to reach around her a small degree. Now mark the sequel! No sooner had she perceived his movement, than she created a scene that raised a commotion among, not only the people employed therein, but the crowd of customers who filled the place. The enraged, shocked, insulted madam at once summoned one of the proprietors, and assuming that lofty mien so becoming the queens of tragedy, when thrilling an admiring audience, she accused the precocious youth of a deliberate attempt to hug her in broad daylight before that storeful of people! Was ever such an outrage dreamed of in the world's book of horrid doings! It was useless that the well-nigh dumb stricken child attempted an explanation; that the proprietor pronounced him the perfection of proper, well-behaved, manly boys; she would not be placated, and only his summary dismissal from that service would retain her customary patronage. And that cowardly, mean, brutal, inhuman man threw that boy, whom he knew to be innocent, out into the street to save a few paltry dollars from a being undeserving the name of woman, who doubtless would not be averse to genuine, generous hugging from stronger source, did the mantle of secrecy shut out from her husband the guilt of her conduct, for if she could be guilty of lying that boy out of a job that gave him and possibly a helpless mother a living, she is capable of doing things little less criminal, even if more reprehensible in the eyes of the world.

Need Reforming.

The telegraph and messenger boys of this city might be profitably given lessons in politeness. Their duties require them to come into contact with ladies and gentlemen as well as with rowdies and hoodlums. Those youths no more think of entitling a gentleman "Mr." than if they were raised among a tribe of savages. If, when taking a message to a person who cannot be easily found, the inquiry of the boy is generally, and with a swaggering independence, in tone that so highly savors of the Barbary shoals: "Say, where's Jones?" or, "Where's Mary Smith, don't yer know?" If he is unable to find Mr. Jones and Mrs. Smith, either of whom may be old enough to be his grandparent and possibly the most respectable personage in town, he retires from this labored effort to deliver the dispatch or message that may be of life and death importance, with a surly growl of "I ain't going to hunt for him no more; if he wants his message he's got to come after it." Again, some of that young gentry are in the habit of calling at the wrong house at unearthly hours in the morning, two, three, or four o'clock, with telegrams that arrived early the evening before, to enquire for the residence of well-known citizens whose addresses are conspicuously printed in the City Directory. Their employers should teach them how to gain that information without disturbing an entire neighborhood by ringing the wrong door-bell to obtain information about a citizen who resides blocks distant.

Herbert Spencer has chronicled this fact: "Wives in England were bought from the fifth to the eleventh century, and as late as the seventeenth century. Husbands of decent station were not ashamed to beat their wives. Gentlemen arranged parties of pleasure for the purpose of seeing wretched women whipped at Bridewell. It was not till 1817 that the public whipping of women was abolished in England."

An Evil of the Time.

One of the evils of the time is the lack of a specified money allowance for married women. Taking a recent article on the subject as a text, the New York Sun takes occasion to point out that "the wives of rich men maintaining luxurious establishments are kept practically penniless themselves. Their husbands, with more or less grumbling, pay their millinery and haberdashery bills, but leave them unprovided with a private purse from which they can draw at pleasure for their little wants and charities. If the wives need money, no matter how little, they must beg it from their lords, and give an exact account of what they propose to do with it. They are looked upon by their neighbors as rich and enviable, but in truth they are poorer than their very servants, and with less liberty. They are treated as if they were children not to be trusted with money, and as of no financial discretion."

"Accordingly, after the manner of the enslaved, the wives use deceit and trickery to obtain the few dollars they want to expend in their own way. They 'get their milliners to send in a bill for forty dollars instead of thirty, the real price, in order to take the extra ten for themselves.' It may be that the husbands are not penurious, but merely thoughtless, not to say selfish. They want pocket money themselves, but they may forget that their wives want it also. They like freedom for themselves, but they imagine that with women matrimony is a full compensation for its loss. They prevent the development of business sagacity in their wives by never allowing them to cultivate it; and yet, as we know from France, and from many examples in our own country, women are capable of great shrewdness in affairs. A man's prosperity, as we all know, is oftentimes due to the practical wisdom of his wife, and his adversity comes from her folly and vanity. Frequently the better head in the partnership is the woman's."

"In general, if a woman is worth marrying, she is worthy of pecuniary trust; she can be allowed to carry money. Very many men are fools when it comes to selecting wives and mothers of their children; and the development of the capacity for self-support in girls undoubtedly tends to cultivate their spirit of independence. Women who are accustomed to earn money do not want to beg it from their husbands, and if matrimony imposes on them the slavish necessity, trouble is likely to ensue in the household. When they enter the partnership of marriage they feel that the profits and assets of the establishment should be held in common. They come but not as dependents, but as equals; not as subordinates, but as principals. They think that their moral and sentimental capital is the equivalent of the cash capital put in by the men, who, by asking the women to come into the partnership, acknowledge that they cannot get along without them."

"Every girl who marries ought to be assured of support that does not bring her humiliation. She ought to have a purse of her own, no matter how small. She ought not to be made a beggar in the household—a beggar, as so often happens, in the midst of plenty."

"The French custom of accumulating a dowry for every daughter of a family, no matter how humble, is altogether sound. From the day the child is born the money for the purpose is laid aside, and if, as she grows, she earns money for herself, she contributes to it. Then when she marries she has a little money capital of her own, with all the accruing moral and material advantages. That is the proper way, and as civilization and population increases, it will become the custom here."

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

New fruits are added to the list almost daily. Everything fresh and choice at our market, and prices always low. Telephone No. 188. Send orders to Garzoli & Genis, 712 K street.

Hereafter a commercial lunch will be served at the Café Royal, corner of 7th and J streets. This will be welcomed by the business men as the lunch will be first class in every respect, and at popular price.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos.

Death of Solomon.

There is a legend concerning the death of Solomon alluded to in the Koran and found in the chronicle of Tabari, which is to the following effect: Solomon employed the genii in building the temple, but, perceiving that his end was nigh at hand, prayed God that his death might be concealed from the genii until the work was completed, for Solomon knew that if he died and the genii knew of his death they would leave off building. Therefore he made himself a staff from a tree in the garden, and leaning upon this staff, with his head bowed in adoration, he died in the temple. His soul was taken so gently from him that the body remained standing, so continuing for a whole year. Those who saw him thought he was absorbed in prayer, and they dared not approach him. Still the genii worked night and day until the temple was completed, thinking they were watched in every detail by the master whose eyes had many weeks before closed in death. But during all this time little white ants had been gnawing at the staff, and when the temple was finished, a long year after the death of Solomon, the staff crumbled under his weight and the body fell to the ground. Mahomet alludes to this curious legend in the following (Koran, Sura xxxiv): "When He (God) had decreed that Solomon should die, nothing discovered death unto them (the genii) except the creeping things of the earth, which gnawed his staff, and when the body fell down the genii plainly perceived that if they had known that which is secret they would not have continued in a vile punishment."

Mrs. Whiton-Stone, a well-known society woman of Boston, in discussing the vexed question of a wife's pin-money, admits that man, as a rule, is chivalrous and generous, but thinks in the domestic shuffle the wife hardly gets a square deal. "Most men have a business training," she says, "and know better than women how to apply their knowledge, but there should be some state ment made by every man to the woman he marries of his financial condition, as also to her parents or guardian. She will then know the whole situation and be able to govern herself by it. There should be a perfect understanding between them, and there can then be no difficulty. Let there be no supremacy of will—only distinct individuality." This is simply the old system under which a wife gets nothing but what she borrows, begs or finds in her husband's pockets after he has gone to bed.

There is a chance that the business of the household cook will become one of the delicate arts. One woman of education and refined tastes has already adopted it as a profession and is meeting with success. Mrs. Jennette Miller, an Irish lady, one of the graduates of the Westminster Cooking School, a woman of good family and social position, in pretty cap and apron, goes out to private houses to prepare company breakfasts, luncheons and dinners. She has more engagements offered her than she can possibly fill, and the remuneration is by no means stinted. This opens up a large field of industry for women, and it is hoped that the trained nurse has preceded the trained cook but a short time.

The French tailors have evidently taken this view of the case. They are up in arms, fighting tooth and nail against the present form and color of gentlemen's evening dress. Instead of the habit now worn by gentlemen on every available occasion they call for the general adoption of colored coats, embroidered vests, knee breeches and silk stockings. These brave followers of the sartorial art have issued an address in which they state that it is high time to abandon the old conventional weakness, and to this effect, and in conjunction with some of their aristocratic patrons, they intend to organize what are called bals de la toilette in Paris and Lyons during the winter.

One of the governors of a grammar school complained to the head master that on the previous evening he had seen one of the top-form boys flirting with a young lady. The head master accordingly spoke to the occupants of the said form in severe terms on the impropriety of such conduct, and wound up his harangue by saying that out of consideration for the parents he would not name the culprit, but invited him to come into his private room at the close of the lesson. That the governor's acuteness of observation was considerably below the mark was evident to the head master when six crestfallen top-form boys presented themselves at the private interview.

A man in Philadelphia stole a violin, and pleaded guilty, giving as a reason that he wanted to go to jail to get away from his wife. In seven years of married life she had broken up his home forty-seven times. The stony-haired magistrate refused to abet this kind of a separation, and discharged the prisoner.

Deserting His Post.

Among the recruits sent from the Highlands of Scotland to Wellington's army in Spain, during the Peninsular war, there was a certain John McDonald, whose massive frame and six feet five inches of stature amply bore out his nickname of Big John. Those of his clansmen who were already in the British ranks naturally looked for some wonderful exploit on the part of a man whom they had always regarded as the recognized champion of their tribe; and, in fact, John's first week of soldiering was marked by an achievement which is not forgotten yet.

In those days of constant fighting fresh men were often shipped off to the seat of war with very little preparation, and Big John was still very "green" on the subject of military rules and regulations when he was set to mount guard over a field piece in one of the batteries of a British fort on the frontier of Portugal.

The night was wet and stormy, and McDonald, though he would have cared nothing for being drenched to the skin while following the trail of a stag over his native mountains, found it rather uncomfortable work to pace slowly up and down a few yards of wet, muddy pavement. At length, finding things getting worse and worse, our friend John, little dreaming that he was committing one of the worst crimes in the whole military code, took the gun off its carriage, and bearing it on his shoulder to the barrack, lay down beside it in his usual place, and was soon fast asleep.

Now just then Master John's Colonel, who had been vaunting the discipline of his garrison to some friends that were dining with him, was leading them round the fort to show them in what good order everything was kept. But, unluckily for his credit, the first thing they came to was John's vacant post, where the cannon was missing as well as the sentry.

"I say, Gardiner," cried one of the guests, "it don't say much for your 'discipline' that the very first sentry on the line should have deserted his post."

"And pocketed the cannon before doing so," chuckled a waggish junior captain.

The Colonel, boiling with rage, went straight to the barrack, and found the deserter sleeping peacefully, with his head pillowed on the gun that he had been set to watch.

"How dare you desert your post, you rascal?" roared he, shaking him furiously.

"Nay, you can't say that," put in another officer, pointing to the gun, "for you see he has brought his post along with him."

At sight of the cannon the Colonel's rage changed to amazement, and he asked, hastily, "How on earth did you bring that gun here?"

"John carried it gun herself," answered Big John, simply.

"Carried that gun yourself?" echoed all his hearers with one voice. "Nonsense!"

"If you can carry that gun back to its place, my man, I'll let you off scot-free."

John obeyed at once, to every one's astonishment; and the junior captain remarked, with a grin, that although he had often heard of soldiers "carrying" a battery, he had never till now seen them do it one gun at a time.—Harper's Magazine.

Prof. Miller of Karlsruhe has made some interesting observations on clouds. The highest clouds, cirrus and cirro-stratus, rise on an average of nearly 30,000 feet. The middle clouds keep at from about 10,000 feet to 28,000 feet in height, while the lower clouds reach to between 3,000 feet to 7,000 feet. The cumulus clouds float with their lower surface at a height of from 4,000 to 5,000 feet, while their summits rise to 16,000 feet. The tops of the Alps are often hidden by clouds of the third class, but the bottom of the clouds of the second class, and especially of the thunder clouds, often enfold them. The vertical dimensions of a cloud observed by Prof. Moller on the Nettleberg was over 1,200 feet; he stepped out of it at a height of about 3,700 feet, and high above the mountain floated clouds of the middle class, while veils of mist lay in the ravines and clefts. The upper clouds were growing thicker, while the lower ones were dissolving, and soon it began to rain and snow.

General Hardee, the famous tactician and Confederate commander, says the Boston Traveler, was a strict disciplinarian. One day, while commanding in the Southwest, he rode out on the picket line, and, much to his surprise, found a sentry, a raw recruit, sitting on a rail fence munching a piece of bacon. The General appeared not to see him until he got abreast of him, and then drew his horse up, expecting to find the sentry at a present. He was nothing of the kind, but sat munching away as unconcerned as though he was in his native mountains. "Do you know who I am?" demanded General Hardee, in his severest tones. "Stranger, I 'low I don't." "I am General Hardee, and—" Without stopping to hear the remainder of his sentence the recruit slowly climbed down from the fence, and shambling into the road extended his hand as he said: "How air ye, General? I'm mighty glad to see yer looking so pert."

The Blessed Grotto at Lourdes.

At Lourdes there is a certain grotto, as the Chicago News, wherein is said to have been accomplished most marvelous cures of human maladies. The Roman Catholics believe that this spot is under the special and saintly influence of the Virgin Mary, and that but one visit to the place is required to relieve any believer of whatsoever illness or grief he may be afflicted with. The pilgrimages to this remarkable grotto have been numerous, and seemingly miraculous cures are reported. A member of the royal family of England believes that her cure of a distressing malady was due to a pilgrimage to Lourdes, and she has recorded a vow to make other pilgrimages to the grotto to testify her gratitude to the Virgin. Not very long ago an interesting conversation took place between the Prince of Wales and Mgr. Lavigerie.

"Your eminence," said the Prince, "will you conscientiously tell me if the priests, the guardians of the sanctuary at Lourdes, are in good faith in their recital of the cures which they declare to have witnessed, and if one can trust their words?"

"Your royal highness," answered the Cardinal, "I vouch for the guardians of the grotto as for myself. I have ascertained with my own eyes certain marvels which have been worked in this blessed place."

"In that case," said the Prince of Wales, "there only remains for me to go to the grotto; but I shall do so in the strictest incognito."

It transpires that the Prince, true to his word, has visited the grotto, but whether he experienced relief from the physical disabilities with which he has long suffered remains yet to be recorded.

An incident of the battle of Waterloo, heard from the great duke himself, was told by Lord Shaftesbury, the philanthropist, to the late Sir George Burns, in whose biography it is given by Mr. Edwin Hodder. At one moment in the battle the Duke of Wellington was left alone, his aides de-camp having been dispatched with messages. A gentleman in plain clothes rode up to him and said: "Can I be of any use, sir?" The duke looked at him and instantly said: "Yes; take that pencil note to the commanding officer," (pointing to a regiment in the heat of the engagement). The note was taken and delivered, its bearer galloping through the thick of the fight to execute his commission. After the battle the duke made every inquiry but never could find out to whom he was indebted for the service. He told Lord Shaftesbury that he considered this one of the most gallant deeds that had ever come under his notice, seeing that it was done without prospect of honor or reward.

TALK IS CHEAP,

and the press teems with advertisements of sarsaparillas, and other liver, blood and lung remedies, but there is one medicine, and only one, the claims for which, as a cure for all lingering diseases arising from Torpid Liver or Biliousness, or from impure blood, are backed up by a positive guarantee. If it don't do just as represented in every case, the money paid for it is promptly refunded. This peculiar medicine sells beyond all others throughout the civilized world. And why should it not? "Talk is cheap," but when it's backed up by a positive guarantee, by a house of long established reputation, for honesty, integrity and sound financial standing, then words mean business! And that's just what the World's Dispensary Medical Association, of Buffalo, N. Y., mean in guaranteeing their Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery checks the frightful inroads of Scrofula and, if taken in time, arrests the march of Consumption of the Lungs, which is Lung-scorfula, purifies and enriches the blood, thereby curing all Skin and Scalp Diseases, Ulcers, Sores, Swellings, and kindred ailments.

A Luminous Bottle.

To obtain light instantly without the use of matches and without the danger of setting things on fire is, according to the Mining and Scientific Press, an easy matter. Take an oblong vial of the clearest glass, put into it a piece of phosphorus about the size of a pea, upon this pour some pure olive oil heated to the boiling point, the bottle to be filled about one-third full; then cork tightly. To use the light, remove the cork, allow the air to enter, and then recork. The whole empty space in the bottle will then become luminous, and the light obtained will be a good one. As soon as the light becomes dim its power can be increased by opening the bottle and allowing a fresh supply of air to enter. This ingenious contrivance may be carried in the pocket, and is used by watchmen of Paris in all magazines where explosive or inflammable materials are stored.

We make our lives cold prose when we might make them poems. We make our lives lyrics when we might make them epics—brave, progressive, triumphant. We build the house of character of lumber—and poor lumber at that—when we might build it of brick; we build it of brick when we might build it of granite. We try to create a breeze of some moral or spiritual inspiration from our own lungs when we might feel the strong and steady wind of heaven. We are content with well doing when we should be content only with best doing. In one of Voltaire's romances a character is endowed with several hundred senses. This addition changes the aspect of all things. Men might add many faculties to their present spiritual possessions, but they are inclined to refuse such enrichment. The ample truth is, we should live the largest, broadest, deepest, highest life possible. We should push out the cubical lines of thought, faith and choice to their fullest extent.

"Oh, dear," sighed a housekeeper in my hearing the other afternoon, "I wish some one would tell me what to cook, and, at the same time, invent some new kind of meat for dinner. I am so tired of ordering the same things and thinking the day before what I should cook the next. I vary the order, 'beef, mutton, veal,' to 'veal, beef, mutton,' but even that does not help much." "Try a few drops of lemon juice over the mutton," a veteran suggested, "and I think you will find the flavor improved. Make a curry of the cold veal and stew tomatoes with the beef." She followed the suggestions and found she had an almost unlimited field of change and variety.

"Ethel," said a fond mother to her daughter, as the fair young girl sat down at a late breakfast in her morning gown, "did George leave any package for me last evening?"

Ethel blushed and said flatteringly: "Why, no, mamma! What made you ask?"

"Oh, nothing; only I heard him say at the door as he said good-bye, 'Now, here is one more for your mother,' and I didn't know but what it was that pattern for lace edging that his mother promised to send me." Ethel was silent.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

War is a cruel and often fruitless means of settling international differences. Actuated by a humane idea, and one up to the advanced notions of modern civilization, the late American Conference recommended a definite plan of arbitration for the adjustment of differences between the American nations, and invited the nations of Europe to join in the plan. One of the principal features of this plan is a declaration that the right of conquest shall not be recognized to American nations. Moral principles should govern political societies and amicable adjustment of all differences between nations should be the rule. Under the articles formulated by the Convention, arbitration shall be obligatory in all controversies concerning diplomatic and consular privileges, boundaries, territories, indemnities, the right of navigation and the validity, construction and enforcement of treaties. The only questions excepted from arbitration are those which may involve the independence of any particular nation; in these cases arbitration shall be optional with that nation, but obligatory on the adversary. Differences antedating the treaty must also be subject to arbitration. Arbitrators may be selected from other powers, than those included in the American nations. The office of arbitrator may be intrusted to tribunals of justice, scientific bodies, public officials, or private individuals whether citizens or not of the States selecting them. When all the nations consent the provisions of the treaty with regard to arbitration may be disregarded, and a different arrangement agreed upon. Adjustments by arbitration are much preferable to the arbitrament of war.

The Emperor of Germany will shortly issue an edict directing that teachers in the national schools must be familiar with the principles of political economy, to enable them to demonstrate the error of socialistic teachings. More attention will be paid to the comprehension of the ethical side of religion. In the higher schools recent modern history, especially of Prussia, must be taught, and the benefits which the Prussian Kings have always conferred on workingmen must be inculcated. The edict was drafted before Bismarck resigned. If more care was taken in the education of our American people in the science of government and political economy there would be less of the infamy of unintelligent voting. There should be greater safeguards thrown around the elective franchise and many restrictions placed upon it. Our custom of indiscriminate admission of ignorant foreigners to the right of electors must be restricted. No man should be permitted to assume the greatest prerogative of the American freeman, until he understands and appreciates the boon conferred upon him. Thousands of men are clothed in full citizenship before they even understand our language. We understand that in the Second Congressional District of this State there are twenty-eight hundred Italians who are voters, over three-fourths of whom do not speak the English tongue. They are said to be clanish and will not hearken to any words that do not come from their own class. At the recent election this large body of men, who do not comprehend our system of government, and who do not desire to understand it, were controlled in the interest of one particular party.

Can it be said that influences like this can possibly reflect the true will of this people?

The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of Judge Sawyer wherein the latter held that the ordinance regulating and licensing retail liquor dealers in San Francisco was unconstitutional. The Federal Supreme Court decides that Police Commissioners have arbitrary discretion to grant or refuse liquor licenses and that the ordinances granting such powers do not infringe any privilege or right of the applicant for license. This decision is in accord with the opinion of our State Supreme Court upon the same question and in the same case. Sometime before Judge Sawyer rendered his opinion, the State Supreme Court in bank held that the ordinance regulating the traffic of liquor in San Francisco was valid. The broad and comprehensive ground taken by the latter Court was that the authorities have the power to prohibit the sale of liquor absolutely if so disposed, and having that right certainly possessed the power to do the lesser act of restricting the same. This determination of the question will enable our local authorities to enforce the regulation ordinance passed some time ago by our Board of Trustees, and which has remained inoperative by reason of Judge Sawyer's decision in the case mentioned above. There are too many dives and disreputable places where intoxicating liquors are dispensed. A few changes in the city ordinance on this subject will give it vitality and enable the enforcement of a splendid police regulation. Arbitrary rules are often necessary, and there is no necessity greater than the abrogation of these festering sores on the body politic. Respectable saloon men should be the most earnest in cleansing the community of the low dives of infamy and robbery which abound in many quarters of this city.

Some months ago THEMIS ventured several articles in criticism of the manner in which the free text books for our public schools have been compiled and arranged. When those strictures or comments were written it was after the books had long been tried in the schools and after they had been most ferociously and justly attacked and condemned by school-masters themselves in private; or at least in such company only as they knew to be safe and when they felt assured they did not jeopardize their places and salaries. What this paper said of the books was intended more with a view of inviting a close scrutiny of them by the public in the hope of demonstrating and proving the truth of what was asserted and thus inaugurating a new and improved edition, than in a spirit of factious fault-finding. Although many glaring inaccuracies were pointed out, many trifling methods cited and a great many absurd things plainly, but kindly, demonstrated as appearing in the books which tended to either lead the child astray or else bewilder it in an effort to compass the meaning and intent of the "new method," yet not a paper in the State, that we are aware of, gave any attention to the subject and passed it by as the idle winds and as of no consequence, whereas no subject of any character, not even a proper interpretation of our legislative acts by the Supreme Court, is of such vital import as this very question of the correct instruction of the children of the State. It is a subject before which all others—tariff, finances, revenue, silver, the creation of new States or the making of Presidents—become insignificant. For is it not those very children for whom the books have been designed who are to hereafter manage State matters? Then how all-requisite that they should be intelligently grounded at school for the part they are to enact? And yet the State press has let the question rest in abeyance without a word of comment to the present time, and the children, aye and teachers, too, have been struggling to master the intricacies of the "new dispensation." One individual, apparently hurt at some blow THEMIS delivered, let his spleen get the best of his judgment far enough to criticise the rhetoric of this paper's commentaries, but he had not a word of defense to advance for the books. It was apparent that the truth had been told by us and it was one of the occasions when "the truth hurt." But we are glad to find that the papers are at last awaking to a realization of the fact that those school books are a disgrace to the State, for the Examiner last Monday had a column leader devoted to a sarcastic attack on them. And now is the time for every paper in California to inaugurate a crusade against retaining them in their present condition of inaccuracies and glaring blunders. The Legislature meets in January and one of its first and principal duties should be to enact proper measures for re-compiling and intelligently editing the entire series. Nor should any gratuitous, charitable labor be allowed on them; the State can and will grant liberal compensation for the work required to give us a perfect set of books such as a State so liberally endowed with school funds justly deserves and expects.

It is a freak of modern writers to endeavor to overthrow our faith in the beautiful legends of antiquity, and when an absolute accomplishment of the end cannot be attained, then different versions are given and palmed off as original creations of poetic fancy. Certainly poetic license does not go to that extent. The modern essayist would have us believe the legend of Adam and Eve should be reversed, and that Adam, not Eve, was the cause of the great downfall. The poet Ovid gave us his narrative of creation, wherein the nobler animal, man, was created, after the birds, fishes and beasts were put upon the earth; that all the animals turn their faces downward, and man was created upright and raises his face to heaven. It was the evident original intention that man should be upright in all things as well as in stature, but time has effaced the cardinal principle in the great majority of Promethean creatures. According to the narrative the Titan, Prometheus and his brother Epimetheus, were detailed to do the work of making man and all other animals. After endowing all the animals with their respective gifts of courage, strength, swiftness and sagacity, Prometheus sent up and stole some of the fire from heaven to give man, in order that he might make weapons to subdue beasts, and tools with which to till the earth, as well as warm his dwelling and bid defiance to cold. Here comes the point where our modern essayists attempt to change the beautiful story of creation, by laying all the ills and evils of the earth to man in place of woman. After the Titans had finished the work of creating and endowing man, there appeared a necessity for something more to make the world perfect. Woman had not yet been made, but it was thought such a creature would render all things perfect. Jupiter made her, but it was for an entirely different purpose. She was sent on earth as a punishment to Prometheus and Epimetheus for their presumption in stealing the fire of the sun, and of man for accepting it. This first woman was named Pandora, and was very beautiful and accomplished, every one of the immortals contributing something to make her

It is a fact of political history that fusion always results in confusion. There is rarely any fixed or definite principle established by any hybrid mixture in politics. Great political reforms are not attained by these fusions of parties so diametrically opposite in ideas and principles. The order in such instances is "fusion, confusion and defeat"—defeat of all principle, although a few individuals may succeed in political preferment. The strange combinations of the Eastern and Western "Farmers' Alliances" will develop this fact.

There is not a moment without some duty.—Cicero.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

"First catch your machine," turn a crank and, hey presto! you have a modern melodrama!

La Cigale is one of the greatest successes ever known in light opera in London, as may be gathered from the circumstance that the entire theatre is booked for six weeks ahead.

All attempts to glorify the Hebrew in dramatic presentations hitherto have failed. The nearest approach to it is found in the character of a Jewish banker in Men and Women, the new production at Proctor's Theatre, New York.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Few sillier or flatter shows than U and I, have ever got on to the stage to trick and defraud the public. It should be a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, to charge any one $1.50 or even $1, for admission to shows of this class.

Among the alterations contemplated in the reconstruction of the big Academy, New York, for the past four years the home of The Old Homestead, is the erection on the roof of the theatre of a handsome summer garden. During the stay of the play at the Academy the play has made a fortune for everyone connected with it and has made enough money to pay for the extensive Academy's site as well as for the building itself.

Soubrettes—singing, dancing and otherwise, are at present a great drug in the theatrical market. A prominent manager of the metropolis, failing to secure in the ordinary way the number of chorus girls needed for a production he contemplated, hit upon the plan of advertising for soubrettes. From three or four hundred of this peculiar commodity who answered his card, he was enabled to successfully complete his cast of singers.

If Mrs. Bernard-Beere comes over next year there will be an exhibition of all-round acting which will recall the palmy days of Clara Morris. Mrs. Bernard-Beere is long, slim, muscular, sinewy, intense, thick-lipped, heavy-eyed, intelligent and versatile. She is known as the English Bernhardt, and she has achieved a unique and pointed degree of prominence on the English stage because she is the only woman of fame who does not wear corsets. In England, where it is the controlling desire of one woman to look like all her sisters, this species of originality is valuable. Mrs. Bernard-Beere's years are probably forty.

Five thousand dollars is the average sum a successful dramatist can command for a good play. The sum is usually paid in installments, $500 being paid the author on ordering the work, another $500 or $1,000 on its completion, and the balance in weekly royalties until the purchase price agreed upon is paid in full, after which the author has no further claim on his creation. This, of course, does not mean that every play offered for public approval costs that figure. Many productions are adapted from foreign works at small cost, and some of the most successful ones are written wholly or in part by the star players appearing in them. The best play perhaps ever produced in this country, certainly by long odds the most successful, was written by the actor who has been presenting it continually at one theater in New York to an overcrowded house for the past four years. The play is The Old Homestead, at the Academy, and Denman Thompson wrote every line of it.

Mr. Edward Willard, a member of the Philadelphia Bar, has written an historical tragedy entitled Julius Cæsar, the treatment of which is ambitious, while the poetic skill and grace with which the subject is invested make the work one which assuredly deserves a place in contemporaneous dramatic literature. The action is based upon historic lines, and closely follows the accepted story of the conspiracy against Cæsar, his murder in the Capitol, and the subsequent events leading up to the death of Brutus at Philippi. Mark Antony, Cassius, Casca, Dentatus, Calphurnia and Portia pass across the pages, each character being clearly differentiated and marked by strongly contrasting individuality. The facile movement of the author's lines is one of their charming features. Too often, even with poets who can pen sweetly musical numbers, the effort to write blank verse causes the muse to halt with both feet, but Mr. Willard has given us lines which are rounded, sonorous and harmonious, and adapt themselves well to the expression of passionate emotion or to the right projection of pictures which are sought to be called up before the mental vision. As an illustrator of this faculty of reproduction take the following lines from the opening scene in the first act:

There was a time when, after glorious war,
There came a hallowed rest of blissful peace.
Then industry assured the joys of home.
And from the sloping hills the vintner's song
Thrilled its sweet melody, and from the fields
The song and jest that lighten labor ran.

While mellowed tones of lowing cattle, blent
With fragrant odors of the field and wood,
And all the airy hum of glowing life,
Becalmed the wearied heart and soothed the sense
With nature's ecstasy of happy rest.
Peace, plenty, happiness—that trio blessed—
Nestled on every hearth. The peasant sat,
When time had tolled the hours of his toil,
In sweet contentment at his cottage door.
While doting wife and children, open-eyed,
Drank in the stirring tales of camp and field.

It is this quality of grouping familiar objects and making a genre picture which belongs to the English poets, and which is also possessed by Mr. Willard. It is found in Shakespeare and in Milton, and it exists though in a lesser degree, in Cowper, Thompson and Wordsworth. The rich coloring of Keats and Shelley is absent, metaphor does not run riot, and there are no vivid imaginings nor tropical fancies; but the want of these is compensated for by placid, quiet and calm repose, and if the passions are not stirred there is at least a subjective feeling which soothes and lightens.

Mr. Willard has also brought the same faculty into play when he makes Casca describe a class of men who, unfortunately, did not cease to exist when the Roman empire fell:

No scheme too vile, no worldly art too mean
To help and serve the politic use of men
Who cringe and crawl and squirm, and lick the hand
Of him who holds the key to power and place.

* * * * *
The cunning, plotting politician—ha!
Oh, what a complex animal is he!
He cheers with those within, hoots those without.
He never pays his honest debts, and yet
As baliff would he hound his fellow-man.
The public coffers are his assets, and
He guards the pile with zealous, watchful care,
And never wastes a groat that he can steal.
Self-interest is his only god and creed,
And when he gains his pinnacle of place
He shuns the friends who helped him there, because
The world must think the bladder of his power
Was swelled by merit only, yet he feels His utter nothingness of self when, with Fate's cruel stroke, it shrinks to vacant air!
Frugal in virtue, prodigal in sin,
Religion hath he none; and yet he prays.
But prays in sight of men. His only joys
Are plunder, wine and lust; and all his fears
The loss of office and the dread of work.

There are softer passages, too, in the tragedy. Portia says in soliloquy:

O! spirit of love,
Unquenchable and unconquerable;
It is immortal as the gods! It sheds
A glowing radiance o'er the wastes of life;
It singeth with the stars! It germs in all
The fruitful sap of nature, and its song
Trills with the purling brook in lispings waves
And foaming seas its gracious murmurs swell,
And in the swaying boughs of wind-tossed trees
It murmurs heaven's grace to erring hearts.
It soothes all pain and woe, and lessens grief.
It melts all cares, as doth the morning sun
Dissolve the vapors that becloud the dawn.
It guides the tottering steps of aged man,
O'er the receding sands of time, until
His footfalls echo with the past, and death,
With solemn requiem, lulls to lasting sleep.

While the author's work has about it a dramatic element, there are not sufficient action and movement to fit it for presentation on the stage. But the closet drama also has its uses.

Professional Chat.

"Dr. Pellet cured you, I understand?" "Yes."
"He's a homœopath, I believe?" "Yes." "Then you are sugar-cured, I suppose?"

The young doctor has a slow time to "catch on" in London. In that vast population there are seventy-five physicians to every 100,000 persons.

Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker, the eminent preacher of London, has begun a novel crusade against old methods of worship of exhortation. Dr. Parker argues that preaching is no longer an effective instrument of the gospel, and that preachers should deal in some way more directly with the daily life of the people. He is quoted as saying: "Preachers are living in a fool's paradise, driving theology instead of saving souls." He has invited correspondence from all classes of persons for the purpose of learning what the public think of the pulpit and its methods.

"It is related of Admiral Selfridge that during Grant's second administration he was spending an evening out, informally, and, on being joked on his withdrawal at the early hour of 10 o'clock, replied that if the others kept on eating late suppers they might not live as long as he, though they were all nearly, or nearly all, younger than he. The Admiral is now nearly ninety years of age; and of the others present on that occasion ex-Secretary Robeson alone survives. General Belknap, Justice Miller, General Garfield and Senator Zach Chandler were among the guests.

Eugene Field tells this story in one of his London letters: "Mr. Gladstone ran into town from Hawarden early the other morning, and feeling uncommonly hungry he dropped in about 8 o'clock at the Rugby Club for a quiet breakfast. He looked so relaxed that no one would have suspected that he was the grandest of grand old men. The sagacious waiter took him for a "rounder"—one of the boys. "What have you got to eat?" demanded the old gentleman. "I beg your pardon, sir," answered the waiter, haughtily, "but we don't serve suppers after 4 A. M."

Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, when a certain bill was brought into the House of Lords, said, among other things, that he prophesied last winter this bill would be attempted in the present session, and he was sorry to find that he had proved a true prophet. My Lord Coningsby, who spoke after the Bishop, and always spoke in a passion, desired the House to remark that one of the right reverend had set himself forth as a prophet, but for his part he did not know what prophet to listen to, unless to that furious prophet Balaam, who was reproved by his own ass. The Bishop, in reply, with great wit and calmness, exposed this rude attack, concluding thus: "Since the noble lord hath discovered in our manners a similitude, I am at loss how to make out the other part of the parallel; I am sure I have been reproved by nobody but his lordship."

From the Grass Valley Telegraph we obtain the following good story of the late Judge Belden: One day during the war Judge David Belden, who was then practicing law in Nevada City, was approached by a rebel sympathizer with a ten-dollar greenback in his hand. Crumpling it in his fingers, the latter said sneeringly to the Judge: "Do you call this thing money? Do you think it is as good as gold?" Taking the greenback in his hands the Judge stretched it out, and looking at it asked: "Do you ask me for my legal opinion, if this is as good as gold?" "Yes, I ask for your legal opinion, or any other, thoughtlessly responded the other. Gravely stuffing the bill into his pocket, the Judge said: "In my opinion the greenback is as good as gold," and was turning on his heel. "Hold on," cried the other, "where are you going with my greenback?" "Oh!" said the Judge, "you asked for my legal opinion. I have given it to you, and as the money just covers my fee for advice, I will keep it and send you a receipted bill."

There lived some years ago in western Pennsylvania, says the Philadelphia Record, an old circuit preacher, whose genial humor and kindness of heart had greatly endeared him to all the people of his district. He was a particular favorite with the young folks matrimonially inclined, and his opportunities to "tie the knot" were numerous. On one occasion he found upon his arrival at a certain town several couples awaiting his blessing. The old man was tired and wished to make short work of the job. "Stand up," he began, "and jine hands." Which being done he rattled through a marriage service that, like himself, was original. "There," he said, when it was finished, "ye can go; ye're man and wife, ev'ry one o'ye." Two of the couples hesitated, and finally made it apparent that in the sudden "jining" they had been confused and had taken the hands of the wrong persons. The old preacher's eyes twinkled as he took in the situation, but he instantly straightened up, and with a wave of his hand dispersed them. "I married ye all," he said. "Sort yourselves."

A well-known lawyer, who has always taken considerable pride in the classic mould of his clean-shaven face appeared at the county court-house recently with a well developed growth of very unbecoming beard, says the New York Times. Every friend that he met wanted to know why he didn't get shaved, and finally he corraled half a dozen of them and told them the reason. He had never learned the art of shaving himself and had always patronized one barber. Not long ago this barber dropped into the habit of telling him that he (the lawyer) had a mesmeric eye. The lawyer didn't mind much what his barber thought of his eye so long as he shaved him satisfactorily. But having discovered that the lawyer's eye was mesmeric, the barber went a step further and once in a while after making a slip with his razor would explain that he was mesmerized so that he did not know what he was about. Matters went on this way for a week or so, the barber insisting that he was mesmerized every time the lawyer looked squarely at him, and the lawyer taking it for granted that the mesmerism business was a dodge of the barber's to excuse the occasional cuts of his razor. A different aspect was put on the case, however, the last time the barber shaved his lawyer customer. Leaning over him after he had finished, he asked if the lawyer thought a man would be excusable for cutting the throat of one who mesmerized him. The lawyer said he certainly would not be excusable and got out of the chair as quickly as possible. He afterwards learned that the barber had become a perfect crank on the subject of mesmerism and nothing will persuade him that he did not have a narrow escape. He will probably go to another barber sometime, but at present his nerves are so shaken by the occurrence that he prefers to wear an unbecoming beard to sitting down in any barber's chair.

NOTES.

From the photographs of Governor-elect Pattison, of Pennsylvania, there is a remarkable likeness of Governor-elect Markham, of California.

Wm. Beckman's majority for Railroad Commissioner will be about three thousand. A "scared wolf" comparison does not do justice to the situation.

Tuesday night last, H. Weinstock delivered a very interesting lecture, taking as his text, The Story of the Jews. The lecture was a sketch of the history of the Jewish people. Mr. Weinstock is a very pleasing and entertaining speaker and has no mannerisms.

The Siamese have great regard for odd numbers, and insist on having an odd number of windows, doors and rooms in their houses and temples. There must be an odd number of steps in the stairs and an odd number of feet in the height of all steeples and minarets.

The gerrymanders of five States by the Democracy made it impossible for Republicans to hold their majority in Congress. This fact, added to the desperate resolve to send a solid delegation from the solid South, made it a certainty that the next Congress would be Democratic, no matter what might occur.

Blackening the nose and cheeks under the eyes has been found to be an effectual preventive of snow blindness, or the injurious effect of the glare from illuminated snow upon the eyes unaccustomed to it. This is a cheap and available receipt for our citizens who visit the Sierras in winter and spring.

It is said man's lower jaw has much freedom of lateral movement. Our neighbor, the Bee, seems to think that some of our citizens trades unions have too much freedom of both jaws, and are trying to put a legal seal upon them, through the medium of the Court. The freedom of the jaw, both upper and lower, has been demonstrated by the lawyers on both sides.

"Tell me, dearest Emma, will you be mine?" "Will you always let me have my own way?" "Always, dearest." "And my mother may live with us?" "Willingly." "And not ask for a latch-key?" "I would rather throw it in the sea." "And give up your club, and always be at home to dinner?" "Always and on the minute." "Then you must excuse me, but you are not at all the sort of a man I should wish for a husband."

Natives of Africa refer to whiskey as "shame water," but it appears they are not ashamed to drink it. Agents of the German Government are accused of carrying large supplies of "shame water," which they can readily trade for ivory, and other articles of value. There is said to be a degree of thirst in Africa at times, which would induce a native to barter a whole elephant for a quart of this "shame water."

"The holy carpet," says Galigani, which is now being brought back to Cairo, where it will have to submit to the indignity of quarantine for 15 days, is one of those which are periodically taken to Mecca, to be sanctified, and is made of a thick sort of silk embroidered with letters of gold, each letter being 2 feet in length and 2 inches broad. It covers what is known as the Beat-Allah or inner sanctuary of the temple.

There can be little injury effected by the next Democratic Congress in matters of important legislation. The election bill, an apportionment bill, the measures for relieving the Supreme Court, in aid of American shipping, and the bankruptcy bill—most of which are already ripe for passage—should all be made laws before March 4th next. After this is done and the protective measures for our national industries and labor have been given a fair trial before the people, there will be little doubt of the popular verdict in favor of Republican principles in 1892.

Here are some sweet and pertinent quotations for tray clothes, table scarfs, serviettes, and doilies: "Drink to me only with thine eyes;" "Honeyed dew is not sweeter than thy lips;" "Breakfast with what appetite you can;" "Good wine and good welcome can make good people;" "Why are pleasant hours so short?" "The absent ones to memory dear;" "May good digestion wait on appetite, and health on both;" "Small cheer but great welcome make a merry feast;" "Bread is the staff of life;" "Enough is as good as a feast;" "Every day brings its own bread with it;" "Waste not, want not;" "Trust begets truth;" "Try before you tread;" "Better half a loaf than no bread;" "Crumb not your bread before you taste your porridge;" "There ne'er was a fire without some reek;" "God be wi' ye."

M. Faye, member of the French Academy of Science, thinks that it is feasible to predict storms twelve hours in advance of their coming by the sounds which the changing atmospheric conditions produce and which the telephone will transmit.

The street sprinklers in the residence portion of the city have abandoned the sprinkling of the streets, evidently relying on Jupiter Pluvius, to do the work for them. In many portions of the city the dust is "knee-deep" and has become a nuisance to the residents. It must be somebody's business to see that this nuisance is abated and prevented.

Where we find modesty in women, there the standard of men's self-respect is high, and they will be chivalrous, honorable and courteous to her. It is only when woman places little value on her purity and sacrifices herself upon the shoals of so-called swift, social life, by dressing beyond her means, and seeking an immodest notoriety, that man becomes careless of her reputation and of his own.

The Brooklyn Times, N. Y. makes the following terse predictions: "There is one comforting reflection to be got out of this election business, and that's fortunate, for comfort is dear to bruised and world-sick souls. The Democrats will take their signal victory in the Congressional elections, to mean a repudiation of the McKinley bill and the tariff by the people. They will be encouraged to fight the great fight of 1892 on free trade lines. Even if Northern Democrats see the folly of it, Southern Democrats will insist upon it. The indorsement of the Mills bill by David B. Hill is a significant token of Southern sentiment before election. After the election the brigadiers will not be less likely to insist upon a tariff reduction platform and candidate. On that issue we can beat them."

Bismarck and Emperor William seems to have clashed again. The young Emperor is not satisfied with the old Chancellor's retirement from public service, but is disposed to have a word to say upon the private enterprises of the grim old veteran. Bismarck is engaged upon the publication of the life of William I. and the young Emperor demands the right to examine the proof sheets before publication, on the grounds that the work contains references to important matters of State. Bismarck denies the right of the Emperor or anyone else to overlook his work, and threatens, if the demand is insisted upon by the Emperor, to have the publication made in England. The Emperor, in that event, would probably cause the confiscation of the book throughout Germany. This, on its face, seems to be a very trifling affair, and beneath the generous impulses heretofore accredited to young William.

When we consider the millions of acres of uncultivated land in this country it occurs to us that the application of the Chinese laws would be a good thing. In China the owner or holder of land would be promptly dispossessed from his garden or farm if he neglected to cultivate it to its fullest productive capacity. A failure to utilize all the productive land in China would prove disastrous on account of the crowded condition of the country. Everything possible is brought into requisition that tends to fertilize the soil. There are no weeds upon the cultivated tracts in the Celestial Kingdom; there is no room for them. No insects or grubs which destroy our vegetation have room for lodgment in a Chinese garden or field. It is a noticeable fact that the Chinese gardeners in California can usually produce very much more from a given quantity of land than any other race, the thrifty Italian not excepted.

Shakespeare says, "Men have died and worms have eaten them, but not for love." Some one else says very few men die of age. Death is the result of disappointment, personal, mental, or bodily toil, or accident. We often see the strong man cut down suddenly and the invalid living his four-score years and ten. The fact is that the strong man uses up his strength and the weak one nurses the little given him. The passionate certainly shorten life, and sometimes suddenly end it. "Choked" with passion is very often not an exaggeration. The lower animals, which live temperate lives, have their prescribed term of years. The horse lives 25 years, the ox 15 or 20, the hog 10 or 12, the rabbit 8 or 9, the guinea pig, 6 or 7. The numbers all bear proportion to the time the animal takes to grow its full size. Man is the only animal that seldom comes up to the average. He ought to live 100 years, according to the physiological law, for five times twenty are 100, but he scarcely reaches an average of four times the growing period. To sum it all up, man is the most hard-working and laborious of animals, also the most irregular and intemperate. He is irritable, and often wears out, or is consumed by the fire of his own reflections.

Judicial Wrongs.

The history of criminal jurisprudence in all countries has taught the undeniable fact that circumstantial evidence should be carefully and jealously watched and considered by both Courts and juries and with a great deal of suspicion. The greatest of our "criminal judges" have taught by their charges to juries that such evidence, unless most substantially corroborated by other and more convincing means of conviction, is very hazardous and dangerous to life, liberty, and property. If a judge at all understands himself he will charge his jury most emphatically on that point. Yet there are those on the bench who seem to care little for the consequences resulting from too great faith in circumstantial evidence. It has been observed that juries are too prone to blindly follow the lead or example set by other juries on the same panel. To illustrate: At a term of Court a venire of jurors is summoned to try all criminal cases on the calendar; the first jury tries and convicts a criminal; the general result is that all of the juries selected from that venire deem it their duty to return verdicts of "guilty" in all cases. They thus run in a groove, and all—too frequently innocent, alike with the guilty—must fall victims to a feverish anxiety of a few world-reformers to do what they call their duty to the people. Too little attention is paid by juries to that benefit accorded by the law to defendants and called "a reasonable doubt." It would be hard to find how many innocent men are suffering severe punishment without cause. Two years ago in this county, the writer was called on to defend a man who was charged with burglary. When the case was called in the Superior Court the arresting officer and other policemen testified to the guilt of the defendant, and produced evidence which was deemed sufficient to send him to the penitentiary. After the prosecution rested, three officers from Placer county were examined for the defense and each one of them positively identified the accused as a man who had spent the night on which the burglary had taken place in this city, in the Auburn jail. The jury could do nothing but acquit. Yet if the Placer officers could not have been produced, the accused would have been sent to the State prison for a term of years, there to develop into a vindictive criminal, prepared to prey on the human family for revenge.

But one of the latest and saddest victims of mistaken identity in criminal trials—the case of Nelson—we would now speak. Could a more horrible judicial yet innocent outrage on a good citizen have been perpetrated. He was accused of a robbery hard by the city; the victims of the robbery never saw the face of the man who perpetrated the felony, yet one of the men assumed to swear that Nelson's voice was that of the robber and the astute jury, disregarding the fact that there was room for doubt, agreed with the complaining witness and rendered a verdict of guilt that sent that innocent victim to a felon's cell in the State's prison. A year after a notorious highwayman and all-round criminal confessed to the crime and Nelson is released to freedom. But does that fact suffice to repair the monstrous wrong done him in his character and reputation? It is suggested that the incoming Legislature may vote him a sum of money to compensate him for the time of his incarceration. It may be done or not, for there is no law permitting or sanctioning it and if done must be an act of charity and compassion. But it is not sympathy but exoneration that Nelson should be accorded and that by the public voice. Therefore, the people of Sacramento, where the personal wrong was done, should arise and in a benefit given for him do all they can to assist in redressing the injury, and while adding to any sum the Legislature may vote him, proclaim to the world that this community not only sympathizes with Nelson, but gladly accords to him the place he once occupied among honorable and honored men. Such action on the part of our citizens would redound to their own magnanimity and manhood and show that they know how to be generous as well as just.

She Broke the Charm.

In a little town, just a few miles down the road on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, is a regular old-fashioned tavern. The dining-room is most attractive, employing for waiters some half a dozen sweet, rosy-cheeked country girls. How I admired one beauty there—such a rosebud mouth, and what eyes and hair! When I was ready for dessert she came for my order. "Pie or puddin'?" she queried. "Well," I asked, "what kind of pie have you?" "Oh, we've three kinds, open-face, cross-bar and kiver-top—all made of apples." Shades of all departed grace! And with such a face and form!—Chicago Times.

He who does no good gets none. He who cares not for others will soon find that others will not care for him. As he lives to himself so will he die to himself, nobody will miss him or be sorry he is gone.

The Creole Charmers.

From New Orleans, where the typical creole is cleverest and most charming, a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press writes: In personal appearance the creoles are a well-looking race. The men are usually good-looking, sometimes strikingly handsome, in the brunette type, and though short of stature, they are broad shouldered and muscular. At her best the creole girl is irresistibly pretty, the dark wonder of her great, long-lashed liquid eyes further enhanced by a storm-cloud of hair about a low, smooth brow, brilliant white teeth, delicately-moulded features and a clear olive complexion. Her figure is lissom and rounded; supple and slender without angularity or attenuation, and her hands and feet are small and dainty. Now and then a strain of Andalusian blood produces a charming milk-white blonde, with violet eyes and shimmering golden hair, doubly piquant among her darker sisters.

Though the rigidity of the old system of chaperonage has somewhat relaxed, the creole girl is not allowed as much freedom as her American friends, and in many respects she is more unsophisticated. For instance, she does not understand love-making for "fun," for the men of her race do not think it honorable to indulge in such questionable jesting. If one of them pays certain marked attentions to a young lady, it is understood that he wishes to make her his wife. Such matters are looked upon seriously, and the rupture of an engagement is considered almost compromising to a girl.

The creole damsel is not tailor-made, by any means. When money is not plentiful she is her own modiste, with very charming results, for her garments are coquettishly feminine and become her as its gay plumage becomes a tropical bird. Feminine! That is the key note of her character. She still believes that it is woman's duty to be pretty and pleasing above all things, and her family does its best to shelter her from coarsening influences. Perhaps from this springs the creole prejudice against public schools. It will be remarked that, even when they are poor, they strain a point and send their children to private seminaries.

Somewhat timid and conservative, the creole girl does not "go in for culture" quite so energetically as the American girl; she does not belong to so many clubs and classes for mental improvement; she does not want to vote; nor does she yearn for a mission. Like the French jeune fille she is apt to look forward to marriage as the feminine destiny, being eminently fitted for wifehood by her sweetness of nature and domestic tastes. As a mother she errs on the side of over-devotion to her children. That she grows stout—alas! with increasing years, is the only dark spot in the picture; but you will find that the creole matron though she may have lost the lithe grace of maidenhood, has preserved much of her beauty of face, most of her lightness of heart, and all of her smiling good temper.

Although the creole girl is not addicted to delving among dead languages, she has often three or four modern languages at her disposal, and is also clever with the brush and pencil. An excellent taste in music is common to all, and there are many who are distinguished by musical talent which is cultivated to a pitch far beyond the limits of a drawing-room accomplishment.

To see the creole belles in their glory you must visit the French opera house in Bourbon street on a Saturday night. At such times, horseshoe curve of the balcony might well be styled the line of beauty.

Not so many diamond necklaces to dazzle the gazer, as may be seen at the New York Metropolitan; but the shoulders are as white as any in all the broad land, and a single glance will convince you that the creole girls have not lost their family jewels—those lustrous, brilliant eyes that have come down to them from generation to generation.

An Animal Flower.

The inhabitants of St. Lucie have lately discovered a most singular plant. In a cavern on that island near the sea, an immense basin of brackish water has collected. The waters are as clear as crystal and reveal millions of varied colored pebbles on the bottom. Each of these pebbles furnishes a resting place for from two to five of a most remarkable species of plant—a plant much more nearly allied to the animal than to the vegetable kingdom. The shallow waters around the edge of the pool look for all the world like well-kept beds of rare and wonderful flowers; all bright and shining in color, the majority of them reminding one of the marigold family, only that their tint is much brighter.

Those seeming flowers, on the approach of the hand or a stick, retire, like a snail, out of sight. On examining them closely, the middle of the disc is found to be provided with four brown filaments, resembling spider's legs, which move around the petals with a brisk, spontaneous movement. These filaments have pinchers with which to seize the food upon which this queer animal-plant subsists, the food of the strange creature being spawn of fish and marine insects thrown into the pool by the action of the tides.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Miss Eunice Goodrich will hold the boards of the Clunie Opera House all of next week. She will play comedies written by herself. During the week she will present Dad's Boy, Wanted, a Husband, A Show Man, Zizi, the Actor's Daughter, and Innocent Sall. When here two years ago she became a prime favorite with the public. The little lady is said to have a good company to support her.

Last night A Brass Monkey was given at the Clunie Opera House. It is needless to say the house was packed. There were new features and new faces in the company. It was a merry farce, and one of Hoyt's best satires. Superstition is the text and the superstitions of man were humorously portrayed. To-night, A Brass Monkey again.

A Dog Habit of Long Existence.

Have you ever watched a dog turn round and round before he finally curls himself up on his mat or in his basket to sleep? Undoubtedly almost every young Box reader has done so without giving a thought to the cause of this old and invariable performance. Years and years ago, when dogs were wild animals instead of the peaceful, domestic beasts they are now, their homes were in the woods and fields, and their beds matted grass and leaves. It was to trample enough grass and to properly arrange the leaves that the dog always trod around a narrow circle before he would lie down. All dogs possessed this habit, which amounts to an instinct, and to-day a dog has to do it without needing to and, of course, without knowing why he does it. It is curious that a habit should thus long survive its necessity; if, however, a race of ducks should be kept from water for several generations the little duckling whose mother, grandmother, great grandmother and so on had suffered this deprivation would still know what to do when she came suddenly to a pond.

An Old Timer Gone.

"Uncle Alf" was the familiar term applied to A. H. Estill. On Thursday last "Uncle Alf" passed from earth at Reno, Nevada. He was one of our big-hearted, noble-souled men. Old and young alike were his friends. He held many positions of public trust and honor in this State. His generous impulses always found a ready exit for his worldly goods. A. H. Estill was a native of Tennessee, but came to California in his early youth, in 1850.

Mrs. Geo. Gale, of San Francisco, is visiting Sacramento, and is the guest of Mrs. W. W. Grissim.

The Supreme Court is holding its semi-annual session at the Capitol. There is a large calendar to be disposed of.

Geo. Nelson, who was the victim of circumstances and convicted of highway robbery, has returned to his old home an exonerated man. Thomas O'Neill, who has charge of the work at the State Capitol, has given Nelson employment on the work. This is a generous act of O'Neill, and a timely consideration for Nelson.

George Oakes of the Hayward's Journal is a candidate for appointment to the important office of Superintendent of State Printing and is understood to have the support of influential friends of Governor-elect H. H. Markham. T. G. Daniels of the Alameda Argus was said to be a candidate for the same appointment, but this is a mistake. Mr. Daniels says he is not a candidate.

Ahead Again, As Usual.

Although retail dealers have been notified by all the wholesalers in the United States, that on account of the new tariff and other causes, all musical goods have been advanced at once 40 to 100 per cent. above old prices. Now take notice that, while our immense stock on hand lasts, together with a very large invoice we are now receiving from European manufacturers, on which we escaped the high duty, as well as the wholesaler's profit, Cooper's music store (always in the lead) will make no advance in prices. Address Cooper's music store, 631 J street, Sacramento, for price lists.

Hereafter a commercial lunch will be served at the Café Royal, corner of 7th and J streets. This will be welcomed by the business men as the lunch will be first class in every respect, and at popular price.

Popular music at 10 cents per copy; prices elsewhere range from 35 cents to 75 cents. Catalogues furnished on application. Hammer's music store, No. 820 J street. Sole agency Chickering & Son's pianos.

Three hundred and twenty-five dollars at $5 per month will buy a new cheap piano at Cooper's music store. Also, first-class pianos sold as reasonable as anywhere, at Mathushek piano agency, 631 J street.

Mathushek Pianos are the best. Twenty years' test has proved it.

Fits Us All at Times.

The Pittsburg Dispatch man has drawn a little pen portrait that fits us all occasionally: Do you ever have the blues? Or are you sunny always, sour, grumpy, morose, exacting, irritable never? Some time or other you have fallen out with the world, now haven't you? And then how miserable you are, and how miserable you make those about you, too. Peevish, fretful, exacting—nothing goes right, everything goes wrong. You see a black spot on the sun, a dusky streak instead of its bright ray, or else it is too dazzling and too warm. A laugh sounds like a shriek, and a smile on the face of a friend merely contorts his features. You kick the dog and frighten the cat. You lay violent hands upon the chairs and long to smash the furniture. You cannot relish the breakfast and feel like cursing the cook. Your coffee is dishwater, your toast is burnt, your eggs are stale, your plate is cold. And how cross wife is, too. The baby—well it's simply unbearable. And in this mood you start off to the mill loaded with your grist of grievances. You bowl along without greeting friend or dodging foe. Your mind only holds one picture, and that is a black one, to be sure. And you keep looking at it, don't you? Yes, you have the blues—out of joint with yourself and all belonging to you. What a mind-mirring, gruesome, cheerless state you're in, to be sure. But not for keeps, after all. A cloud gathered somehow or other, and passed away as mysteriously as it came. Then you call yourself a bear, a brute, a monster. O, how you long to pat the dog you kicked, rub the cat you frightened, kiss the baby you scowled at. And then you laugh—a sort of a graveyard guffaw, to be sure, but a laugh all the same—a laugh that breaks through the cloud and tickles you back to your old self. So there you are again, a man and a brother. The sunbeam dances and the people are really gay, aren't they? Then you brighten up and completely brush the cloud off your mind. Only the memory lingers long enough to permit you to square up with your household gods, and then it vanishes. When the blues come again it may haunt you. If it does you are panoplied for resisting them. Your foot may miss the dog and the cat won't scare, nor the baby cry when you scowl if you use the memory of the first attack to chase off the second. The blues to you now are like the bogies were then. They are ghosts that can be exorcised by cheerfulness and guarded against by temper. A smile will keep them at bay and a laugh will frighten them away.

A wife recently gave her husband a sealed letter, begging him not to read it till he got to his place of business. When he did so he read:

"I am forced to tell you something that I know will trouble you, but it is my duty to do so. I am determined you shall know it, let the result be what it may. I have known for a week that it was coming, but keep it to myself until to-day, when it has reached a crisis, and I cannot keep it any longer. You must not censure me too harshly, for you must reap the results as well as myself. I do hope it won't crush you."

Here he turned the page, his hair slowly rising.

"The coal is all used up? Please call and ask for some to be sent this afternoon. I thought by this method you would not forget it."

He didn't.

A LUCKY LADY.

MILAN (Teun.), Sept. 23d. Mrs. G. W. Combs, of Humboldt, Tenn., a former resident of this place, has recently fallen heir to half a million dollars left by her Scotch grandfather. She has forwarded proof of her relationship to the lawyers and will receive her inheritance to-day.—Evening Mail and Express, New York, Sept. 23, 1890.

We are Mrs. Combs' lawyers, and by her seeing our advertisement became the agents of her good fortune. We have a number of similar claims in our hands and expect to gain them. If your ancestors came from the old country, write us, and inclose 25 cents for a reply. There are more than half a billion dollars in Great Britain alone, unclaimed, which rightly belong to people in the United States. EUROPEAN CLAIMS AGENCY, 50 Pearl Street, New York.

Juggernaut.

Juggernaut is variously pronounced as Jag-gernath, Jumergutha and Jagannatha, the last being the Sanscrit and probable root of the many words of the same general construction, all of which signify "Lord of the World;" really one of the names of Vishnu, the second god of the Hindoo triad. Jag-gernaut, besides being the name of the idol representing Vishnu, is also the name of a town or city in the Province Orissa in Bengal, British India, the city having taken its name from Juggernaut's car and idol enshrined within its walls. The ground upon which the town is built is considered holy, and is held by the community as common property, no tribute being exacted from any resident, other than that he perform certain rites in and about the temple, thus proving himself a Hindoo and a believer in Vishnu in his manifold forms. The city of Juggernaut has about 50,000 inhabitants, but as there is a religious festival here once every month, the population constantly within its borders falls but little short of 150,000. The principal street of the city runs north and south for two and three-fourths miles, both sides being formed by an almost unbroken line of Hindoo temples, all of which are overshadowed by the great Temple of Juggernaut, which stands at the southern extremity of the main street. The "great temple" rises to a height of nearly 3000 feet and is surmounted by a bronze-covered dome, the point of which reaches 160 higher. The wall which surrounds this gigantic pagoda is a square with sides 650 feet in length, is 18 feet thick at the bottom and nearly 40 feet high. Besides the great pagoda in honor of Juggernaut, the enclosure contains temples and idols dedicated to dozens of the other Hindoo deities. All of the idols are monstrous in design and frightful-looking in appearance. That to Krishna (another name for Juggernaut) is painted blue and has a face hideous in the extreme. According to Hindoo legend Krishna was killed by a hunter. His bones were found under a tree and brought before King Indradyumna, who was directed by one of the gods to form an image of Jagannath (perhaps Juggernaut; see John W. Wright's "Idol of Worshippers of India," p. 355), and place Krishna's bones inside. Visvakarma, a divine architect and sculptor, undertook to make the image, but, being hurried by the King, left off in anger. So Jagannath was left without hands or feet. In compensation Brahma gave the image eyes and a soul. It may be seen by this legend that it was originally on account of the saintly bones within it that the image was venerated.

Besides Krishna or Juggernaut, two others of the idols are provided with immense cars or chariots. The Car of Juggernaut is thought to be the largest wheeled vehicle that has yet been made in the world. It is 34½ feet square at the base and 43½ feet in height, mounted on 16 wheels, each 6½ feet in diameter. Once each year, at the great annual March festival, Juggernaut mounted on the apex of his stately car, is taken to a house about one mile and a half in the country, where a female image is supposed to be waiting to become his bride. The removal of the chariot from the shrine to the country house being a proceeding holy in extreme, no animals are used for drawing the chariot, men, women and children only being permitted to perform such righteous service. On this occasion either five or seven long ropes are attached to the front end of the car the middle one having been twisted from hair cut from the heads of female devotees. It was long a cherished belief in Christian countries that many pilgrims sacrificed themselves upon these gala days, by falling prone before the car and allowing the ponderous wheels to pass over their bodies. It is probable that the accounts of these self-sacrifices have been too highly colored, and that the great loss of life upon such occasions, when thousands of frantic devotees are congregated together, comes more from accident than from a desire to start for heaven from directly underneath the wheels of the holy car.

Best for the Brain.

With respect to sleep for school children, Professor Axel Key says in the Popular Science Monthly: "The growing brain of the pupil needs rest. In Sweden we consider a sleep of eleven or twelve hours necessary for the younger school children, and of at least eight or nine hours for the older ones. Yet the investigations have shown that this requirement lacks much of being met in all classes, through the whole school. Boys in the higher classes get but little more than seven hours in bed, and, as that is the average, it is easy to perceive that many of them must content themselves with still less sleep. It is also evident from the investigations that the sleeping time is diminished with the increase of the working hours from class to class, so that pupils of the same age enjoy less according as they are higher in their classes. It thus appears constantly that in schools of relatively longer hours of work the sleeping time of the pupils is correspondingly shorter. In short, the prolongation of the working hours takes place for the most part at the cost of the time for sleep. This, of course, is wrong. Above all, let the school children sleep."

It must be plain to any who will give the matter a thought that our store would not be thronged from early in the morning until we closed at 8 o'clock at night if its patrons did not realize the decided advantages from Weird.

A strange story is told of a haunted house in Monroe county, Tennessee, near M...ville. This section of the State was... during the revolutionary war and the... people will remember a large square house built on the side of a house, writes a Chattanooga correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. It was the home of an American officer. Here he had taken his young wife and little babe, in the hope of providing for them a place of safety.

The house was built of logs, the largest one at that time in this section. It had two stories, four rooms on the first floor and two on the second floor. To the early pioneers it was quite a mansion.

After remaining for a few weeks with his family the young officer went to the front, where he was killed. Soon afterward his little child sickened and died, and the young wife was left alone. She returned to her father's home when the war closed and the big house was left tenantless.

Several families tried to live in it, but none, it appears, remained more than a few days. They all told a similar story. A steady tramp of feet across the floor, a form wearing a Continental uniform and carrying a babe in its arm, cooing to it and caressing it, then the sound of horse's hoofs rapidly leaving the place.

For years it stood tenantless, and the neighbors regarded it with superstitious awe. Occasionally the form of a soldier could be seen as on horseback he left the house.

One night about five years ago a bright blaze shot out from the roof of the old house, and the neighbors gathered to see it burn. At one of the windows could be seen the form of the Continental soldier dressed in his uniform, while in his arms he held his little babe.

It was so real that a cry of horror went up from those around, but the form did not move, there was no sound and the flames soon enveloped the entire house. It burned to the ground, and nothing is now left to mark the place where it stood. How it could have caught fire is a mystery, and the neighbors could not be induced to believe otherwise than that the ghost of the Continental soldier set it on fire.

Observations.

To know a thing we must see it as a whole; to understand it we must see it as a part.

Whether I shall be unfortunate depends also on others; whether I shall be unhappy depends only on myself.

Even mine enemy can sympathize with my grief; but only my friends can sympathize with my joy.

Heaven is a place into which the more I push others the more I am led myself.

KISSES.

(A la Romeo and Juliet.)

A prominent physician calls the kiss "an elegant disseminator of disease." He says, "fever is spread by it, so are lung diseases." Out upon the gilded and sapless vagabond! Evidently kisses are not for such as he, and the old fox says the grapes are sour. Let him devote himself to making our women healthy and blooming that kisses may be kisses. This can surely be done by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is simply magical in curing diseases peculiar to females. After taking it for a reasonable length of time there will be no more irregularity, backache, bearing-down sensations, nervous prostration, general debility and kindred ailments. It is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded.

A Book of 160 pages, on "Woman and Her Diseases, and their Self-cure," sent, post-paid, to any address, securely sealed in a plain envelope, on receipt of ten cents, in stamps.

Advice to Bachelors.
 Agree with the girl's father in politics and the mother in religion, says the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.
 If you have a rival keep an eye on him. If he is a widower, keep two eyes on him.
 Don't put too much sweet on paper. If you do you will hear it read in after years when your wife has some special purpose in inflicting upon you the severest punishment known to a married man.
 Go home at a reasonable hour in the evening.
 Don't wait until a girl has to throw her whole soul into a yawn that she can't cover with both hands. A little thing like that might cause a coolness at the very beginning of the game.
 If, on the occasion of your first call, the girl upon whom you have set your young affections looks like an iceberg and acts like a cold wave, take your leave early and stay away. Woman in her hour of freeze is uncertain, coy, and hard to please.
 In cold weather finish saying good night in the house. Don't stretch it all the way to the front gate, and thus lay the foundation for future asthma, bronchitis, neuralgia, and chronic catarrh to help to worry the girl to death after she is married.
 Don't lie about your financial condition. It is very annoying to a bride who has pictured a life of ease in her ancestral halls to learn, too late, that you expect her to ask a baldheaded old parent, who has been uniformly kind to her, to take you in out of the cold.

Infants' Cards.
 It is a recent and widening custom to announce the birth of a child by sending out a small card with its baptismal name in full upon it; also the date of its birth in the lower left-hand corner. It is inclosed in an envelope with its mother's card. A babe is the only untitled person to whom etiquette permits a card that has not Mr., Mrs. or Miss upon it.
 If visits are not possible a card with "Congratulation" written upon the upper left corner is at once addressed to the mother.—New York World.
 "I am so troubled about my husband," said Mrs. Badman, seeking sympathy from the pastor's wife. "He goes from bad to worse. He is an infidel and an atheist, and now he says he is an agnostic and doesn't know anything and doesn't believe anything, and doesn't think anything."
 "My dear sister," replied the pastor's wife, "you don't know what trouble is. My husband thinks he knows how to cook."—Bob Burdette.

WINFIELD J. DAVIS AND W. A. ANDERSON, Editors.
A. J. JOHNSTON, Managing Editor.

The people of Sacramento are noted for their hospitality. On the occasions of the inauguration of our Governors, Sacramento has always made each successive inaugural an event long to be remembered. It reflects credit not only on our citizens, but the citizens of this great State, that all partisan sentiment is thrown aside and a unanimous good feeling exists when we induct our chief magistrate to the chair of State amid scenes of enjoyment and brilliancy. When the will of the people is expressed in favor of any citizen and makes him the Chief Executive, then all partisanship ceases and we join in our efforts to make the occasion an event which honors the recipient as well as the people. Four years ago it was our pride and boast that the inaugural of Governor Bartlett was a grandly brilliant affair. San Francisco sent a splendid representation to add wit, beauty and splendor to the occasion. Many other portions of the State were superbly represented. This time our Southern neighbors, Los Angeles, and her adjoining counties will come with a full quota of "fashion, beauty and money" to make the inaugural of Governor Markham a grander event than all those preceding. It is meet that our citizens take time and see that nothing is left undone to make the inaugural of Governor Markham eclipse all that have gone before. Such displays are a benefit to the people, and shows our good will to the choice of the people, as well as furnishes an enjoyment to the socially inclined. While these are occasions for fashionable display, they are also democratic, and there are no distinctions of class or creed, respectability alone gives the right of entry. The rich and the poor alike can avail themselves of these public receptions. Let due honor be shown our new Executive and State Officers and members of the Legislature. They will be the guests of Sacramento directly, and of the State generally.

The Supreme Court of this State has an immense volume of business to transact. The number of cases increases each year to such an extent that it is almost impossible to decide them in any reasonable time. While the calendars for the Sacramento and Los Angeles districts are pretty nearly clear, the Court is far behind with the San Francisco calendar. The Court has intimated an intention to adopt a new rule regarding the hearing and submission of cases. It is proposed to authorize counsel to submit cases by stipulation on briefs without having them placed on any calendar. After this submission the Court will take up the cases thus submitted, in their order and dispose of them as rapidly as possible. Our State Court, and the United States Supreme Court have legacies of a large number of cases that they are unable to dispose of.

Some time ago, during the severe criticisms of Minister Mizner, in the Barrundia affair, THEMIS gave a review of the law of the case, and demonstrated the fact that our Minister acted clearly within international law. Subsequently the State Department at Washington vindicated the course of Mizner. We are now in receipt of a copy of a leading Guata-malan paper which contains a full vindication of Minister Mizner. Accompanying this paper is a little note written on the back of Minister Mizner's personal card, addressed to THEMIS: "Thanks to old friends, with 'law and justice' on my side we are all right. Henry Clay said he would rather be right than be President." This note was a recognition of our article above mentioned.

Blaine seems to be the coming man. The great papers of the East and West are of one accord in the advocacy of the Plumed Knight for President. His clear ideas on reciprocity and his splendid diplomatic knowledge and application of international law, make him prominent as a statesman. The brilliant thought, which culminated in the late American International Conference, disclosed the power and ability of Blaine. The marks of his genius is on each proposed treaty, and pervades the great principles put forth by that body. Reciprocity was one of the corner stones of this international structure. There will be no Mugwumps in 1892, that can pull Blaine down.

The New York Sun in speaking of the vagaries of our college professors calls them a noisy clique of doctrinaires, dyspeptic college professors, mugwumps, persons who esteem themselves fitted by superior education and breeding to be the leaders of the people. They are essentially aristocrats, and they cannot get along with the democratic equality of the masses. They are too finical, moping, self-conscious, and self-conceited to be in sympathy with the people or to understand popular sentiment. They are continually taking part in ridiculous little movements to make themselves or their favorites the rulers of the people, and to establish their shibboleth as the countersign of democratic progress. The people laugh at them and refuse to be led by them, and consequently they sit down and weep over the degeneracy of the times. Everything is going to destruction, in their opinion, because their opinions are not followed. They are usually men of a certain degree of cultivation, and many of them are teachers and writers and clergymen who insist upon teaching, writing, and preaching things that are not so.

It seems that mankind is never contented. Wisdom does not make us happy. An active mind only serves to create bodily disquietude, as well as mental unrest. The old adage that ignorance is bliss sometimes forces its power upon us as a truism. There is a deep lesson to be learned from the Zendevesta of Zoroaster, wherein it is proclaimed that they who travel in pursuit of wisdom move only in a circle. The allegory, which has been so tersely put by Goldsmith, inspires us with the wisdom of Zoroaster. Before the nations became numerous, the whole human race dwelt in one valley surrounded on all sides by high mountains, and the inhabitants knew no other world. They fancied that the heavens bent down to meet the mountain tops and formed an impenetrable wall. None had ever ventured to go beyond these confines. The traditions answered for their reasonings, and no inquiry was ever indulged in as to what might lie beyond. All their wants were supplied by bountiful nature, and the people were content; desired no greater knowledge or pleasure. Ambition, pride and envy were unknown. This country was called "The Valley of Ignorance." But time developed a venturesome youth, who conceived the notion of climbing the mountains to see what was on top. He was censured for his folly, but he persisted, and, after great labor, arrived at the height, where he was surprised to find that the skies were still as far off as before. His astonishment increased at the discovery of a beautiful country at a distance, grander than the one within his valley home. Just at this point a genius of modest demeanor came to him, who offered his services as guide, and with inspiring manner, informed the youth that that beautiful country lying before him was the "Land of Certainty," where the inhabitants were blessed with every enjoyment and ignorance is unknown. "I am," says the genius, "Demonstration, and I am stationed here to conduct every adventurer to this land of happiness." The traveler put himself under the direction of the genius, who led him into dangerous places. While in these troublesome places, they were overtaken by another genius, who admonished him that the genius "Demonstration" was too slow, and that he, the genius of "Probability," would soon lead him to the "Land of Certainty," where pleasures await his arrival. After leaving his former modest guide, he soon found that he was in deeper and more serious trouble. He was led forward through infinite difficulties, until they arrived at the border of a dark ocean, with heavy black mists lying upon its surface. Its unquiet waves were of the darkest hue, and gave a lively representation of the various agitations of the human mind. Here the genius of "Probability" confessed that he was not a proper guide to the promised land, where no mortal had ever been permitted to enter. He proposed, however, to furnish another guide to the "Land of Confidence," a region where the people lived in peace and plenty. "Probability" did not wait for consent, but at once summoned a demon called "Error." The yawning earth gave up this reluctant savage, who seemed unable to bear the light of day. He was a hideous monster, with a thousand varying passions. This demon was charged with the duty of bearing the youth over the ocean of "Doubt," into the "Land of Confidence." The son of mortality was blindfolded and instructed under no circumstances, by threats or promises, to remove the bandages. The demon with curses, took the youth upon his back, and with outspread wings, took his flight among the clouds. After passing amid thousands of voices, loud with invective, at length there were words of welcome and shouts of joy, which beguiled the youth to remove the bandage on the thought he had reached his journey's end. The demon produced the welcome sounds for the purpose of being relieved of his obligations, whereupon the unhappy youth fell headlong into the "Ocean of Doubts." The unlettered man, with no desire to penetrate the mystery of philosophy, and whose views are encompassed in narrow limits, has more contentment than he who is constantly exercising his mind towards invention, art, science and philosophy. The acquiring of great knowledge does not bring happiness. The gratification of ambition fails to give us that boon. Wealth is sought and obtained with the thought that contentment follows, but it is so ordained that this only increases our desires, and happiness, like the clouds of the "Valley of Ignorance," is still as far off. There is much of genuine philosophy gleaned from the ancient Oriental writers.

LEWIS VS. LEWIS.

Judge Sharpe had just tied together a bundle of legal papers and thrust them into a pigeon hole when the young man came in.

"How are you, my boy? Sit down. When can I do for you to-day? I've just got the end of a case which ought to be a lesson to all young fellows," said the Judge, all in one breath, as was his manner.

"What case was that, Judge," asked Lossing as he dropped into a chair.

"Lewis vs. Lewis, action for a limited divorce on the ground of incompatibility, cruel treatment, and so forth. You saw the young woman who just went out?"

Lossing nodded.

"That was the plaintiff. Nice sort of a girl, well educated, refined, handsome, and all that; but not the right sort of a wife for the man she married. You see she is the only daughter of wealthy people who had naturally gratified every whim that came into her head. She fell in love with a young man whose respectability was his chief recommendation."

"Well, wasn't that the principal thing to be considered?" exclaimed Lossing.

"Other things being equal, yes; but in this case it was only one of the principal considerations, as you see. The young man was as poor as he could be; he only had a modest salary to depend on, and nothing in the way of prospects. The girl's parents objected at first, but finally consented to the match. They probably knew that she would have her way in spite of all objections they might interpose. You hear and read a great deal about the tyranny of parents who refuse to sanction marriages which they believe will end in unhappiness; but I tell you, my boy, that what is called tyranny is in many cases hard, honest, common sense and good judgment based on experience and observation."

"Well, they were married and for a short time they were happy. Then the young wife began to be discontented. She missed the luxuries she had been accustomed to enjoy. The modest home her husband could provide for her was so different from the elegance with which she had been formerly surrounded, she began to fret. Naturally her husband became angered at what he considered her lack of devotion. When she suggested that her parents would lend financial aid he became indignant and insisted that she be content with her lot until by his own free efforts he could better their condition. You can imagine that this state of affairs soon led to something worse. Quarrels became frequent; love was a thing of the past. No doubt thinking herself much abused she left him and returned to her parents. Then application for separation was made. All efforts to effect a reconciliation were fruitless. Well, this is the end. The law has sanctioned the separation that already existed in fact; the young woman remains with her parents; the young man will probably go to the devil, for his unfortunate marriage has taken all ambition out of him."

"And the lesson!" suggested Lossing.

"Don't marry a woman who is beyond your station financially; don't take a wife from a mansion unless you have a mansion in readiness for her."

"But surely all marriages of this kind don't result as this one has done?"

"No, probably not; there are exceptions to every rule. I am speaking of the rule. You will find as you grow older that it holds good in nine cases out of ten. Marriage is too serious a matter to enter into it lightly, and happiness is valuable to stake it on a chance. Heiresses are content with love in a cottage only in novels; in real life you seldom find love that is strong enough to conquer all the weaknesses of human nature."

Lossing sat in silence for a minute or more. The old man's words seem to have impressed him deeply.

At length he asked a question he had come to propound, received a reply that made the matter clear to him, thanked his adviser and was about to leave when the Judge remarked:

"By the way, my boy, if you want any further points on that case come to my house this evening, and I will show you what authorities to consult."

"Thank you; I shall do so," replied Lossing. He took the kind offer rather as a matter of course, for Judge Sharpe had long ago told him to make use of his library whenever he wished, and he had frequently availed himself of the permission.

Lossing, after leaving the Judge's office, went directly to his own, which was in another part of the same building. Instead of busying himself with the papers that lay strewn about upon the desk he paced to do excitedly for several minutes. Then he sat down and for at least half an hour stared very hard at nothing, perhaps at the wall. Could he have seen his own face just then he would have been surprised at the change that had come over it. There was a hopeless, despairing expression there which would have seemed quite inexplicable to any of those who knew him best.

"There's no other way; I'll have to do it," he suddenly exclaimed, at the same rising abruptly. Then he put on his hat and coat, went out and walked rapidly away.

The evening of that day found him at the house of Judge Sharpe, sitting in the library, apparently engrossed in a legal volume. But as he had been staring at the same page for the last ten minutes, and that page happened to contain merely a portion of the index, it is doubtful that he was as deeply engrossed as he seemed to be.

A light step fell upon the carpeted floor behind him. A young girl had entered the room. A very pretty girl she was, and the glad smile that lighted up her face when she saw the young man made her all the prettier. Walter Lossing had evidently not confined his attention to Judge Sharpe's library on his previous visits. If he had the Judge's daughter would not have been so pleased to see him.

"Pouring over dry legal volumes, as usual, I see. What perplexing case rests heavily on your mind now, Walter? Why, what ails you? You look as glum as if you had lost every friend in the world?"

Lossing had turned and risen as the young girl spoke, and the light streaming on his face showed it to be indeed a mirror of everything gloomy and disheartening.

"It isn't a law case that is troubling me; I would it were only that," he replied, with a sigh that was almost a groan.

"What is it then? Has any misfortune befallen you?"

"Yes, a misfortune indeed; or at least it seems to be now. Doubtless it is all for the best."

"What are you talking about? Why don't you tell me what is troubling you?"

"I came for that purpose, that I might tell you. After this evening we must not meet again."

"Not—meet—again?" Nellie Sharpe repeated the words slowly, as if she could not grasp their full meaning. The color surged to her cheeks and then receded, leaving her very pale.

"What do you mean, Walter? What has happened? You cannot be in earnest."

Walter rather incoherently recounted what Judge Sharpe had told him of the case of Lewis vs. Lewis, and the comments he had made on that case.

"And is that all?" asked Nellie when he had finished. She smiled a little as she asked the question, and a close observer would have noticed that a sigh of relief passed her lips.

"All? Is it not too much? Knowing that your father holds this view can I do otherwise than give you up?"

"I thought you had more pluck," said the young girl, with just a suggestion of scorn in her voice.

"It is not a matter of courage, but one of conscience, of honor. Can I go to the man who gives me such advice as I have received, who tells me never to marry a woman who is beyond my station financially, and ask him to give me his daughter, who is dearer to him than all else?" I am poor; I have none but the most problematical prospects; while you—well, I need not say more; you can readily see my position."

"But I can't see it in the light in which you place it. I thought you had sufficient faith in me not to believe that I would do as that dreadful woman did of whom my father told you. Your prospects are certainly better than what you represent them. Furthermore, my father would yield to my wishes."

"I do not lack faith in you; heaven knows how strong that faith is; it is because I would feel that I had acted treacherously toward one who has been my best friend if I held you to your—your promise that I have decided to do that which will take all the happiness out of my life."

"Probably it never occurred to you that the happiness of any one else might suffer; it seems to me that I am not considered at all."

"You will soon forget; you will be happier than I could ever make you."

"Oh! certainly; we women forget so easily; it is only the men that remember; only the hearts of men that are broken. However, since you so wish it so, it is not for me to object."

"It is not what I wish; it is what I must do."

"But suppose I should refuse to accept your decision; suppose I should assert my rights? Suppose I should insist at least on your trying for a term of years to bring your financial condition up to what you consider the proper standard?"

"It would be wrong to keep you bound by a promise to one who would have to struggle perhaps for years, and might fail at last."

"I see it is vain to reason with one who is unreasonable; it shall be as you wish."

Just then Judge Sharpe entered the room, and the painful meeting abruptly ended.

A few months later Judge Sharpe's clerk came into Walter Lossing's office one day and told him that the Judge wanted to see him.

It seemed to Walter that the Judge looked unusually stern when he responded to the latter's summons a few minutes later. "Come in here, I want to talk to you," said the Judge as he motioned to Walter to follow him into his private office.

"Sit down. I will come to the point at once. I am instructed by a client of mine to bring suit against you. We have the clearest kind of a case, and should certainly win in the Courts; but we desire to give you an opportunity to compromise the matter. You may wish to escape the notoriety."

"A suit? Why, who would want to sue me? I owe nothing; there is no cause, no ground; you must be joking."

"Never was more serious. There is a cause, and a good one, as you will learn presently. My client's case is flawless; she—"

"She? Ah! I see. Some blackmailing scheme; some advent—"

"There, there, don't get excited; it is nothing of the kind. The plaintiff in this case is eminently respectable, as you yourself will admit."

"Who is she? What is the cause of action? Why don't you tell me at once instead of beating about the bush?"

"The cause of the action is breach of promise," said the old Judge impressively.

"Breach of promise! Why, I never—"

"Perhaps you can guess the plaintiff's name now," suggested the Judge.

"You see," continued he, as Walter still sat like one stricken dumb, "the young lady thinks you have been influenced by something that was said to you in a general way by one who intended to make no specific application of his remarks; that she believes that if the matter is presented to you in the proper light no extreme measures will be necessary to make you see that you were altogether wrong in arriving at a certain decision based on the case Lewis v. Lewis."

Walter grasped the Judge's hand; he said nothing; he couldn't have said anything just then, for there was a great, big lump in his throat.

"I need a partner," resumed the Judge; "I have more work than I can manage alone; I think you are just the kind of a man I want, and then, you know, being partners we could easily compromise this matter which I have mentioned. You would have no objections to such an arrangement, I suppose?"

TWENTY THEATRES IN ONE NIGHT.

"How much can a man accomplish in three hours?" he said. "Well, that depends, of course, on what he tries. I have seen parts of fifteen performances in New York in one evening. It sounds like a big story, doesn't it?" This conversation took place between two men when the theatre season was in full blast.

"Now, I tell you what I will do," continued the first speaker. "You would like to experience something new, wouldn't you? You are tired of all the plays. I will give you an interesting three hours, with just enough excitement in it to stir your blood and just enough freshness to revive your spirits. I said that I have seen parts of fifteen performances in one evening. I will make it seventeen, and incidentally we will drop in and see one or two more than that. I will run all risks of intermissions, and guarantee that you see and hear bits of seventeen plays and operas. All that I ask of you is that we start from Niblo's after the rising of the curtain and that you follow me absolutely."

"A pretty hack bill you will run up."

The other laughed. "We will dispense with the cab." We will do it on foot except when we happen to catch a car going our way—not to save time, for it will take us as long as if we walked—but to save our legs."

"Is that a fair proposition?" continued the speaker, smiling confidently.

"Fair for me, certainly," was the answer.

"Very well, then. If I fail to make good my promise I will pay for the supper afterward."

"And if you show me seventeen performances in one night," said the other, "I will pay for the supper for us two and for any two others whom you may invite on the way."

"Good," was the answer. "Meet me at Niblo's at 8 o'clock."

It was five minutes past 8 o'clock when the man who was conducting the race appeared at the meeting place. The other had been there for ten minutes and was smiling at the first slip.

No hurry about this," said A., who had proposed the trial. "Wait until I get a whiff of a cigarette. You see, I am timing the intermissions. It really wasn't necessary to bring you so far down as Niblo's, but I am willing to give you a fair chance to win the suppers." He threw away his cigarette and then went into the theatre. At sixteen minutes past 8 o'clock they were walking up Broadway. A car passed them.

"Better take a car, wouldn't we," suggested the novice.

"Oh, no," answered A. easily. "We have plenty of time and the walk will do us good."

At 8:30 o'clock they stood in Union Square, having dodged into the Star and Union Theatres.

"We are going too fast," said A. "At this rate we shall be forced to see a whole act somewhere to kill time. Let's drop around to Amberg's. We will not count that, however."

"Well," said A. when they stood before the Fourteenth Street Theatre at five minutes of 9, "what do you think of it now? Perhaps I ought to make it nineteen."

"We have spent nearly an hour," was the answer, "and if we count Amberg's we have seen only five." "Wait," said A. "I left out the Academy of Music. That would have made six, but we did not need it. Now for Twenty-third Street." Then they went into Proctor's Theatre, down to the Grand Opera House, back again to the Edell Musee. "This doesn't count either," said A., and thence to the Madison Square. It was half-past 9.

"That makes nine," said A., "but we will only count six."

Crossing Madison Square they visited the new Garden Concert Hall and then whisked around to the Lyceum. Seven minutes of 10.

"That makes eight to my credit and three given away," said A. smiling. "Now you will see my score run up." Five minutes of rapid walking and they were again in Broadway.

"Take a glance at the Fifth Avenue, Hermann's, Palmer's and Daly's," said A. softly.

There was an intermission at Palmer's, but they shot over to Daly's, around to the Standard, saw the New Park and were back at Palmer's at 10:20 o'clock. "About fourteen, I should say," said A. coolly.

A theatrical manager was standing in the lobby. A. found time to introduce him to his friend and invited him to a supper at Delmonico's.

"We will see H— at the Metropolitan," he said, "and ask him."

At twenty minutes before 11 o'clock they were chatting in the Broadway Theatre, having caught parts of the performances at the Casino and the Metropolitan Opera House.

"Count them up," said A. laughing.

"Seventeen undoubtedly, really twenty," answered the other.

"Two hours and forty minutes, eh?" said A. "We might as well see the end of this and then go down to Delmonico's. As a matter of fact we did not take the shortest cuts, but I wanted to give you some encouragement. How did you like it?"

"I feel," answered the other, "a little dazed, as if Hamlet were doing a skirt dance, the Senator were singing a topical song and Hopper were murdering sleep. But I really got excited over the run—and," he added, "I shall enjoy our supper."—New York Tribune.

The Stage.

[Under this caption will appear a fair and impartial criticism of the drama, actors, music, and all noteworthy matters pertaining to the stage.]

How easy a man whips an enemy in a play.

Miss Abbott is the richest woman on the stage.

Playwrights these days have to be good millwrights, too.

A play is over, or done, when it is finished. It is frequently over-done before it is finished.

Women who train for the stage nowadays do most of their rehearsing in the dressing-room.

Bjornstjern Bjornson, the Norwegian writer, has a daughter who gives promise of becoming a great singer.

The other night in New York two men managed to see pieces of twenty theatrical shows in two hours and forty minutes.

A few months since no metropolitan production was considered complete without its "skirt" dance. Now the terpsichorean craze is the "kangaroo" dance, which, in the willowy manipulation of the female form, goes a step or two further—and higher—than its sensuous predecessor.

"What do you think of that singer's voice?" asked a youth of his maiden, at a recent concert, as a particularly loud and florid performer made his bow. "I think he has a large plaid voice," she replied. "That cut is biased." "No, indeed. Why, he fairly gored the whole audience." "Turn about is fair play. We will all be goers soon."

The Sudan, at the big Boston Theatre, is still the phenomenal success it was the very first week of its presentation. During the first five weeks of its run there was an actual attendance of over one hundred and twenty-six thousand people. This is positively the largest number of people that has ever attended a performance in the same period of time in the city of Boston.

The play was over, and they now were driving slowly toward her home. He took her tender little hand and clasped it close within his own. "My dear, if all the world's a stage, as Jacques did say, if this be true, I want to act a certain part, and act that certain part with you. The play I choose! the one called Life, with you to act it to the end. Say! won't you take this part with me, and make me happiest of men?"

Book Chat.

The man who can read Nature is never at a loss for literary entertainment.

It is a commentary when the fact exists, that Zola's wife does not read his stories.

The poet pens his sonnets spruce
With quills plucked from the common goose
While critics pen their piercing lines
With quills from fretful porcupines.

Balzac lived in Paris, knew the city in all its phases, and gained immortality by not going far afield for his game. Dickens and Thackeray were Londoners to the backbone, and one of them was in many ways a cockney. They never thought of writing a novel with Madrid as a background and a Spanish signorita as a heroine.

Some of the most important announcements by London publishers this fall is as follows: "A New Play," Ibsen; "Posthumous Works and Memorials," De Quincey; "Vision of Saints," Lewis Morris; "Autobiography and Correspondence," Cardinal Newman; "Collected Poems," Ruskin; "Earl of Beaconsfield," Froude; "My Social Life," Bashkirtseff; "Wild Beasts and Their Ways," Baker; "Landmarks of Homeric study," Gladstone; "Racing Reminiscences," Chetwynd.

The claim is made that the Aryan races are descended from the Jews. Elaborate proof is attempted. It is held that the word Aryan is from the Hebrew Ari, the title of Judah, assumed by tribes in India who subsequently migrated to Europe and became the ancestors of the Indo-Germanic races. It is also argued that a host of German words were derived from the Hebrew, such as prince, sword, shield, helmet, axe. Hebrew migration, commencing with the son of Esau and the time of Solomon and down to the reign of Cyrus, are cited as evidence. 'Tis an interesting and ingenious claim.

Among titles of books in Cromwell's time we find "High-Heeled Shoes for Dwarfs in Holiness," and "Crumbs of Comfort for the Chickens of the Covenant." An imprisoned Quaker published "A Sigh for the Sinners of Zion, Breathed Out of a Hole in the Wall of an Earthen Vessel, Known Among Men by the name of Samuel Fish." About the same time was also published "The Spiritual Mustard Pot, to Make the Soul Sneeze with Devotion;" "Salvation's Vantage Ground of a Louping Stand for Heavenly Believers," and "A Shot Aimed at the Devil's Headquarters Through the Tube of the Cannon of the Covenant."

Mlle. de la Ramce, writes a correspondent, was dressed in an afternoon gown of lilac, picked out with bits of pansy color, and she looked very much more masculine than ever. Her obtrusive hair and well defined shoulders; her arms shaped like a man's; her mobile face full of light and shade; all gave one the impression of Walter Scott, shaved and thrust into petticoats. There was a young Italian lying curled up like a cat in a sunny couch by the window. He nibbled sweets like a woman, and played with the velvet fringe of the pillows. He was a delightfully indolent animal. After acknowledging the introduction he fell back in the sunlight and dreamily sucked chocolate cakes. The other young man—the possessor of a new hat—drank the Russian tea with lemon and smoked the cigarettes she rolled facilely. Here are a few raps she gave the literary women of America: "You have no women writers in America, have you?" Ouida asked. A question of that sort rather dazes one. "To be sure. There is Constance Fennimore Woolson, who has written some charming Italian stories." "Oh, yes," my hostess made answer. "I remember reading some of them. They give perfect pictures of Italy one sees in—Italian opera in Manchester." "And Amelia Rives Chanler—" "I tried to read one of her books. I couldn't do it. No; there are no women writers in America. In France, and England and Germany the women have taken a front place in literature—especially in novel writing. In America there are no names to be written down with Henry James and Howells. In America the women have every advantage, but petticoat government does not mean intellectual advancement for women." This cynical, yellow woman in her lilac frock drinks tea and brandy and smokes cigarettes; the world to her is hollow as a sucked egg; bitter as green nuts. But there are certain people in the slums of Florence who could tell rare stories of her generosity and kindness. She smokes blase cigarettes and says nothing of them. "Never speak of your good deeds," she remarks. "Some one may find out your motive."

In ancient Greece a law of Pittacus enacted "that he who commits a crime when drunk shall have double punishment;" one for the crime itself and the other for the inebriety which prompted him to commit it.

A poet loved a star, they say,
And 'bout it he did constant rage,
But then it couldn't with him stay,
The star was married to the stage.

Professional Chat.

A person of the male sex who is popularly known as "Sam Jones," says that the initials "D. D." after a clergyman's name stand for "devil's dude." Mr. Jones seems bent upon establishing the fact that when he took to the platform the world lost a great clown.

Pew-renter—"I want to tell you, Dr. Hornblower, how much I liked your sermon on brotherly love yesterday morning. It was powerful and right to the point." Dr. Hornblower—"I am very glad if you enjoyed it." Pew-renter—"Enjoyed it! Well, I should say I did! There are a lot of people in that church that I hate like poison, and you simply gave them fits."

Apropos of a prediction which Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll made ten years ago, Chaplain McCabe, the well known Methodist clergyman, sent the following note to the doughty unbeliever the other day: "Dear Colonel: Ten years ago you made the following prediction: 'Ten years from this time two theaters will be built for one church.' The time is up. The Methodists are now building four churches every day—one every six hours. Please venture upon another prediction for the year 1900."

Dr. T. M. S. Kenney tells this story of foreign mission collection experiences: "I was preaching," said he, "in a certain section of the country, and after the close of the service a good dear brother invited me home to dinner. If I had known what I afterward knew I think, probably, I should not have gone. I had talked for a collection for the purpose of missions, and as we were driving to the brother's home he said to me: 'Brother Kenney, did you notice that I did not give anything this morning?' 'No,' said I. 'I never notice who give and who do not.' 'Well, I didn't,' continued he; 'I couldn't afford it. I'm too much in debt, but when I get rid of these troublesome demands I'll give something to the work of the Lord.' 'But,' said I again, 'don't you owe the Lord something?' 'Well, I don't know; I suppose I do. I never thought of it before in that light.' 'I'm glad you see it now in a different light,' I ventured to remark encouragingly. The dear brother hastened to add, however: 'The Lord don't crowd me as the others do.'"—Kansas City Journal.

When Sheridan was hard up for cash he used to make his wit earn the means of subsistence, and he could accomplish this no better than by laying wagers with the Prince Regent. A discussion once arose, says Spare Moments, as to the respective walking capabilities of turkeys and geese, and the wit expressed himself very incredulous of the assertion that turkeys would walk twice as far as geese in a given space of time. He affected to believe that geese could be driven as fast on the road as turkeys, and the thing appeared so very absurd that the Prince instantly laid him a heavy wager that such was not the case. Sheridan, however, knowing the "early-to-bed" habits of turkeys took care to arrange for a long distance to be traversed, and to fix the period of trial late in the afternoon. The consequence was that evening set in before the rival flocks had anything like arrived at their destination, and although the turkeys outstripped the geese at first, as the shades of night fell they refused to be driven forward, and got to flying up to the branches of the trees at the roadside. The geese, however, were driven steadily forward to the goal, and the Prince, as usual, lost his wager.

"Dropping in to see a friend of mine one rainy afternoon, years ago," said a noted hotel man to a Boston Globe man, "I found a group of four sitting in the office, composed of Daniel Webster, a Mr. Jones, my friend and his brother. After receiving a very cordial greeting and a kind invitation to a quiet smoke and a chat about old times I settled down for a few hours of old-time indulgence. As my broker friend's throat became a little husky, it made him remember something long forgotten, and, turning to his brother, he said: 'I guess, Tom, I'll go up stairs and get a bottle of wine from that case I brought from France over twenty years ago.' By way of explanation to us he told of buying a case of wine in France to be used at a reception to be given him on his return home, but he found death had visited his family while on his way, and the wine was never used. 'Here, Reuben,' he called to his clerk, 'while I am gone up stairs you figure up how much that wine stands me to-day, costing $2.50 a bottle twenty years ago, and be sure you get the interest to a cent.' Well, the interest did amount to considerable on the whole case, and a happy thought seemed to strike Webster, as a large grin spread over his face, but he soon became very solemn again. In a few minutes the bottle stood empty, and such wine I shall never have the pleasure of tasting again. As we were making preparations to leave, Webster turned and said to my friend: 'George, I have thought of a plan whereby you can make some money.' 'How is that?' eagerly inquired Mr. J. 'Suppose we stop the interest on another bottle of that twenty-year-old wine,' exclaimed Webster, with a great sparkle in his great eyes."

NOTES.

"Harry, I cannot think," says Dick.
 "What makes my ankles grow so thick."
 "You do not recollect," says Harry.
 "How great a calf they have to carry."

"A mechanic his labors will often discard,
 If the rate of his pay he dislikes;
 But a clock—and its case is uncommonly hard—Will continue to work though it strikes."

Careful experiments go to show that, for the maximum efficiency of mind and body of the working population in the northern countries of Europe and in the United States, meat or animal products of some kind should constitute at least two-thirds of the total supply.

An officer took in a man the other day because he had a pair of pants under his arm. Any man who would carry his pants under his arm such weather as this should be sent into a back alley out of public gaze and allowed to freeze rather than give him the comforts of a stinking cell.

A little salt sprinkled over the surface of a mustard plaster will enable the patient to keep it on for hours without much suffering. This might be of service to many who are troubled with some of the pulmonary diseases that prevail in winter.

The morning daily says President Scott, of the Pacific Coast Athletic Association, in an interview remarked that "square, honest amateur athletics were never in a 'more healthier' and prosperous condition in California," etc. Ten to a dough-nut Mr. Scott knows his grammar better than that.

A witty paragraph says, that a mixture of the recent tidal wave and landslide makes mud for the Republicans. It is probable, however, that it will become a solid cement for the Republican party in 1892. The salt of the tidal wave will freshen the party, and the cement will avert any future landslides.

A high-school girl was seen weeping the other day. Being asked the cause, she explained that she had heard the police were going to interfere and perhaps arrest her because a boy caught her, and that had been enjoined by the Superior Court. She thought some people ought to mind their own business.

It does seem to people at a distance that the government is temporizing too long with that greasy Sioux Indian, Sitting Bull. He is as great a public nuisance as ever was Dennis Kearney. A Winchester bullet should be made to change his position for him and make him a Lying Bull. He has been standing too long.

In the theory of rotation of crops the farmer only follows nature. Every one at all familiar with our forests has observed that when a pine forest is cleared oaks at once spring up in their place, and vice versa, and when a gap occurs in a hedge it is useless to attempt to refill it by inserting a new plant of the same species, but that some other sort must be used.

In the recent political campaign there were three Prohibition candidates possessing the following suggestive names: Full, Jagg and Treat. With them it was, however, not a condition, but a theory that confronted them. The actual and practical realism might be thankfully applied to candidates with less suggestive names. Many were Full, more had Jags, and all had to Treat.

It is a curious reflection on the intelligence of mankind that while animals easily learn our language we make no advance at all in learning theirs. One cannot help hoping that some future generation of men may be sufficiently kind and patient and large-hearted to believe that what these dependent creatures have to say to us may sometimes be as important as what we have to say to them and to act accordingly.

The Pittsburg Dispatch sums up the qualifications for our so-called good society, thus: A large income which the owner never gained by his own exertions and does not know how to use discreetly; the taste in clothes of a dude, and the culinary tendencies of a French cook. If a man combines in his person these shining advantages, he need never bother his head about such trivial matter as culture or ability or even grammar as claims to social eminence.

Eugene Field says: In the rural parts of Scotland the young women go barefooted most of the year. On Sundays these buxom dancels may be seen proceeding to church with their shoes in their hand and their stockings hung properly over their arses. When they reach the churchyard they sit down on the grass and with more ease than modesty proceed to don their hosen and shoon, for it would be regarded quite improper to enter the kirk without these articles of attire properly disposed.

"Why should they explain, that the times are so bad, Pursuing a querulous strain?
 When Erin gives up all the rights that she had,
 What right has she left to complain?"

If everybody would only discuss the faults of others by themselves, and not in public, there would be fewer people got into trouble. We notice that Mrs. Hill-Terry, of much scandalous fame, has again become the medium of certain newspapers' sensations. Such people should be let severely alone, and not made the subject of any discussion good or bad. No possible good can come of the publication of her scandals. The fact that people read such things with avidity is no excuse for alleged enterprise in their publication.

There is an ignorant foreign element in our population that is absolutely vicious and dangerous. We notice the cropping out of this vile class in the celebration of the election of Caminetti to Congress, from the second district, at a little place called Newtown, where a number of Italians reside. These people who evidently do not appreciate the great privileges granted them by American liberal government, in exulting over the success of Caminetti, who is of Italian extraction, it is said carried their natural vindictiveness to the extent of burning his opponent in effigy. Such people can never be educated to the principles of free government. We repeat what we said in our last issue, that there should be a restriction on the admission of this ignorant element to the rights of free American citizens.

Judge John W. Armstrong, of the Superior Court, has just renounced a learned and exhaustive opinion on the law of individual and personal rights. The decision is virtually a disquisition upon an important question, which has never been determined by any Court in this State. The Judge holds that any act, conspiracy or combination with the object to injure the business of another is unlawful and can be restrained by the strong arm of equity. This careful and learned epitome of the law on the subject of "The Boycott" is interesting reading for all, and will serve to instruct those who desire information on the matters involved. It is probable, however, that the contesting parties will court an opinion from the highest tribunal in the State before a full accord with the views expressed in the opinion are accepted as conclusive. The case calling for this decision is McClatchy et al. vs. McKay, et al., and commonly known as the Bee boycott case.
